

Original from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

LUTHER

NIHIL OBSTAT

C. SCHUT, D.D.,

Consor Depictatus.

IMPRIMATUR

EDM. CAN. SURMONT,

Vic. Gen.

Westmonasterii, die 23 Novembris, 1914.

LUTHER

BY

HARTMANN GRISAR, S.J.

PROFESIOR AT THE UNIVERSITY OF INNSBRUCK

AUTHORISED TRANSLATION FROM THE GERMAN BY

E. M. LAMOND

EDITED BY LUIGI CAPPADELTA

VOLUME IV

LONDON
KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., LTD.
BROADWAY HOUSE, 68-74 CARTER LANE, E.C.
1915

ER 325 G11 5.4

A FEW PRESS OPINIONS OF VOLUMES 1-111.

"His most claborate and systematic biography , . . is not morely a book to be recknown with; it is one with which we connect dispense, if only for its minute commitmetion of Lather's the doposal writings."—The althousand (Vol. 1).

"The second volume of Dr. Griste's "Life of Lather' is fully as interesting as the first. There is the same minuteness of criterism and the same width of survey."

The Athenerum (Vol. 11),

"The interest increases. As we see the great Defermer in the thick of his work, and the beyons of his life, the absorbing attraction of his personality takes hold of the more and more attractly. His superchannel interest in life, impress themselves upon no with releabled effect. We find him the most multiform, the most paradoxical of mon. . . . The present voicine, which is admirably translated, deals rather with the moral, ential, and personal side of Luther's carroor than with his theology, "—The Athenous (Vol. 111).

"There is no more for any sort of question as to the velcome ready among English speaking Bonsan Catholics for this minurally made translation of the trad volume of the German monograph by Professor Grisar on the protagonist of the Reformation in Europe. . . . The book is so studiently scientific, so extern to have its teaching upon documents, and an determined to reclew controversion that are only theological, that it cannot but sleeply lustress Protestant readers."—The deciman.

"Father Grisar has gained a high reputation in this country through the translation of his monumental work on the History of Rome and the Popes in the Middle Ages, and this first instadment of his 'Life of Luther' bears fresh witness to his messential inshistry, wide learning, and scrapplous anxiety to be importful in his judgments as well as absolutely accurate in matters of fact,"—tilangum Hernid.

"This 'Life of Luthor' is bound to become standard . . . a model of every literary, aritled, and scholarly virtue."—The Month.

"Like its two predecessors, Volume III excels in the minute analysis not merely of Lather's actions, but also of his writings; indeed, this feature is the outstanding merit of the sulpar's patient haboves."—The Print Times,

"This third volume of Fathel Offset's monumental Life' is full of interest for the theologian. And not be a for the psychologist is for here more than ever lie author allows himself preprintings the himself and motives and mole islanding of Lather, so as to get at the significance of his development."—The Tablet.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XXI. PRINCELY MARRIAGES . , pages 3-79

 LUTHER AND HENRY VIII OF ENGLAND. BIGAMY INSTEAD OF DIVORCE.

The case of Henry VIII: Robert Barnes is despatched to Wittenberg; Luther proposes bigamy as a safer expedient than divorce (1531); Meianchthon's advice: Tutissimum est regi to take a second spouse. The conduct of Pope Clement VII. The Protestant Princes of Germany endeavour to secure the goodwill of the King of England; final collepse of the negotiations; Luther's later allusions to Henry VIII

pages 3-13

2. THE BIGARY OF PRILIP OF HESSE.

The question put by Philip to Luther in 1626; Philip well informed as to Luther's views. Bucer deputed by the Landgrave to secure the sanction of Wittenberg for his projected bigamy; Bucer's mission erowned with success; Philip weds Margaret von der Sale; Luther's kindly offices rewarded by a cask of wine; the bigamy becomes known at the Court of Dreaden; the Landgrave is incensed by Bucer's proposal that he should deny having committed bigamy. Luther endeavours to retire behind the plea that his permission was a "dispensation," a piece of advice given "in confession," and, accordingly, not to be alleged in public. Some interesting letters of Luther to his sovereign and to Hesse; his private utterances on the subject recorded in the Table-Talk. "Si queum mutare!" The Eisenach Conference; Luther counsels the Landgrave to tell a good, lusty lie; the Landgrave's annoyance, Melanchthon's worries; an expurgated letter of his on Landgrave Philip. Duko Henry of Brunswick enters the field against Luther and the Landgrave; Luther's stinging reply; "Wider Hans Worst," Johann Lening's "Dialogue"; how it was regarded by Luther, Menius and the Swiss theologians. The Hessian bigarny is hushed up. The Bigarny judged by Protestant opinion; Luther's consent to some extent extorted under pages 13-79 pressure

CHAPTER XXIL LUTHER AND LYING

pages 80-178

1. A BATTERY OF ASSERTIONS.

Luther's conduct in the matter of the Bigamy an excuse for the present chapter. His dishonest assurances in his letters to Lea X, to Bishop Scultetus his Ordinary, and to the Emperor Charles V (1518-1520) 4 his real feelings at that time as shown in a letter to Spaintin; Luther's later parody of Tetzel's teaching; his insinuation that it was the Emperor's intention to violate the safe-conduct granted; he calls into question the authenticity of the Papal Bull against him, whilst all the time knowing it to be genuine; he advises ordinandi to promise colibacy with a mental reservation; his distortion of St. Bernard's "perdite vixi"; his allusion to the case of Conradin, "slain by Popo Clement IV," and to the spurious letter of St. Ulrich on the babies' heads found in a convent pond at Rome. His allegation that his "Artickel" had been subscribed to at Schmalkaklen; his unfairness to Erasmus and Duke George; his statement, that, for a monk to leave his cell without his scapular, was accounted a mortal sin, and that, in Catholicism, people expected to be saved simply by works; his advocacy of the "Gospel-proviso"; his advice to the Bishop of Samland to make a show of hesitation in forsaking Catholicism. pages 80-99

CONTENTS

2. OPINIONS OF CONTEMPORABLES IN EITHER CAMP.

3. THE PSYCHOLOGICAL PROBLEM. SELF-SUGGESTION AND SCRIPTURAL GROUNDS OF EXCUSE.

The palpable untruth of certain statements which Lather never tires of repeating. How to explain his putting forward as true what was so manifestly false: The large place occupied by the jocular element; his tendency to extravagance of language; he comes, by dint of repetition, to persuade himself of the truth of his charges. The new theology of mendacity; Luther's earlier views consistent with the Church's; study of the Old Testament leads him to the theory that only such untruths as injure our neighbour are real lies; influence of his teaching on the theologians of his circle: Melanchthon, Bucer, Bugenhagen, Capito, etc.

4. Some Leading Slanders on the Mediaval Church Historically Considered.

Luther's distortions of the actual state of things before his coming; admissions of modern scholars. The olden Catholics' supposed "holiness-by-works"; on the relations between creature and Creator; the Lamb of God; the Eucharistic sacrifice; "personal religion"; Luther's plea that he revived respect for the secular calling; the olden teaching concerning perfection pages 116-131

5. WAS LUTHER THE LIBERATOR OF WOMANKIND FROM "MEDIEVAL DEGRAPATION";

Luther's claim to be the saviour of woman and matrimony; what he says of the Pope's treatment of marriage; marriage "a state of sin"; witnesses to the contrary; Devotional and Liturgical books; Luther's own attachment in his younger days to St. Anne. Various statements of Luther's to the advantage or otherwise of woman and the married life; his alteration of outlook during the centreversy on the vow of Clustity; the natural impulse, and the honour of marriage; expressions ill-befitting one whe

CHAPTER XXIII FRESH CONTROVERSIES WITH ERASMUS (1534, 1536) AND DUKE GEORGE († 1539)

A 1. LUTHER AND ERASHUS AGAIN.

Their relations since 1525; the "Hyperaspistes", Luther's attack in 1534 and Erasmus's "Purgatio"; Luther on the end of Erasmus pages 179-186

2. LUTHER ON GEORGE OF SAXONY AND GEORGE ON LUTHER,

CHAPTER XXIV. MORAL CONDITIONS ACCOMPANY-ING THE REFORMATION. PRINCELY PATRONS pages 194-227

I. REPORTS FROM VARIOUS LUTHERAX DISTRICTS.

2. At the CENTRE OF THE NEW FAITH,

The Electorate of Seveny; the morels of Elector Johann Frederick; the character of his predecessors; Luther's relations with them; the records of the Visitations; Luther compares himself to Lot dwelling in Sodom ... pages 202-210

3. LUTHER'S ATTEMPTS TO EXPLAIN THE DECLINE IN MORALS.

4. A MALADY OF THE AGE: DOUBTS AND METANCHOLY.

The habitual depression in which zealous promoters of the Evange, lived; Melanchthon, Spalatin, Jonas, Camerarius, etc.,; the increase in the number of sucides; expertation of the end of all; the sad case of Johann Schlagmunden.

pages 218-227

1 THE UNIVERSELY PROPERSON, THE PREACHES, THE PASTOR

Relations with the Wittenberg students; entered in which Luther was held by them, he warms them against consorting with evil women. The Preacher and Catechast; the force and practical tearing of Luther's sermons; his austructions to others how best to preach; his discourses at home; the notes of his sermons; what he says of Our Lady when preaching on the Magnifest, his stanish fidelity to the great doctrines of Christianity and his attachment to Holy Scripture; the fine qualities of his German as avisced in his translations and elsewhere. The spiritual guide; his concern for discipline; his circular letters, his strictures on certain legends; his efforts to re-introduce a new form of conference and to further the cause of Church stransc pages 228–237.

2. EMOTIONAL CHARACTER AND INTELLECTUAL GIFTS.

 Intercounce with Friends. The Interior of the former Augustinian Monastery.

The better side of the Table-Talk; his friends and papels on his fandly wave; his disinterestabless, love of sundants; his generosity, his courage when plague threatened; his occasional belitting of his own powers; his prayer and his trust in God; his tack of any real organising talent. Lather a family life; his allusions to his wife, his care for his children gages 251-283.

CHAPTER XXVI LUTHER'S MODE OF CONTROVERSY
A COUNTERPART OF HIS SOUL . . . pages 284 350

I LUTHER'S ANGES. HIS ATTITUDE TOWARDS THE JEWS, THE LAWYERS AND THE PRINCES.

2. Luther's Excuse. "We MUST Curse the Pope and Rin Kingdom."

The Pope is the "Beast" and the "Dragon"; Luther's language in the Table Task, and in the Depotation in 15.8) on the Papal Bearwolf (Werewolf); the Papal Antichrist, Luther's wrath against all who direct to stand up for the Pope how the Pope deserves to be addressed a pages 295-305.

2. THE PRODUCTOR OF LUTHER'S ABUSINE LABOUAGE.

His impovemable tempor; reality of certain minutes against which he thursdered; his vexation with these who, like Carletast and Zwingli, seemed to be robbing him of the credit which was his due; his tendency to be carried away by the power of his own tengen; his need for the stimulus and cutlet provided by vitiperation; his ill-humour at the smallness of the moral results obtained; abuse serves to represe his own teoubles of conscience. Connection of Luther's abuseveness with his rejuite persuasion of his operal call; all his enger really directed against the devil; it is no insult "to call a turnip a turnip." The explanant seasoning of Luther's abuse; some samples; was language of so coarse a character at all insula at that time? Indignation of the 8 was

4. LUTHER ON RIS OWN GREATHESS AND SUPERIORITY TO CHITCHE. THE ART OF "RESTORIC."

His occasional professions of humility; a number of typical savings of Luther reterring to his pseudiar standing and his achievements. The predict one futilised in him, the poverty of the exegens of the Fathers; his reforms more fareaching than those of any Councils; his being alone no better argument against him than against the Whole world. Harmack's dilemma; Was Luther a megalemaniae, or were his achievements commensurate with his claims? His habit of giving free rein to his "rhetorio"; its tendency to extravaganos, unseembress, and, occasionally, to rank biaspherry, "papert and donkey is one and the same, are valo, are taken"; his changeablences; his high opinion of his inward state; his changeablences; his high opinion of himself to some extent fintered by the adulation of his friends pages 327-350.

CHAPTER XXVII. VOICES FROM THE CAMP OF THE DEFENDERS OF THE CHURCH . . pages $41-386

1. LUTHER'S "DIMONIACAL" STORMING. A MAN "POSSESSED."

1. Votess or Convents.

3. LAMENTATIONS OVER THE WOUNDS OF THE CHURCH AND OVER HER PERMECUTIONS.

4. THE LITERARY OPPOSITION

Was Luther really dragged into controversy by the factics of his opponents? A retrospect: The character of the writings of Tetzel and Pricion; Enser, Eck and his Obelishan; him "Emphrishina": Cockhemin "Septiceps Lutherse"; other champions of the Church ... pages 370-386

CHAPTER XXVIII THE NEW DOOMAS IN AN HIS-TORICAL AND PSYCHOLOGICAL LIGHT pages 387 527

I THE BUILD THAT AND THE SPIRIT AS THE "THUS THEIR OF DOCTRING."

Liberty for the examination of Scripture and Luther's autonomy; Lather gradually reaches the standpoint that the Bible is the only judge in matters of faith; those only must be listened to who teach "pursue vertices Dei." Experience given by the Spirit; divergent utterances regarding the perspecialty of Boby Writ; the Rible a" heresy book." Luther not in invoir of verbal augmentain; mistakes of the secred writers; which books are canonical, and why? The discord which followed on Luther's principle of relying on private judgment and the "influence spiritus", he reverts to the "outward Word." in his controversy with Zwingh and corroborates; by tradition. What authority, apart from the Church's, can lay doubts to rest? The object of faith. Many articles, or only one? Protestants on Luther's self-contradictions; the end of Luther's "formal principle."

2. LUTUER AS A BUBLE EXPOSITOR.

 THE SOLA FIRM. JUNIFICATION AND ANSIRANCE OF SALVA-TION.

Connection between the "material principle" (justification) and the "formal principle" (Scripture as the only rule) of Luther's theology, and between the 'miterial principle" and the theory of the worthlessness of works and of God's being the sole real agent; the theory at variance with the teaching of St. Augustine. The mod of strugging to feel entirely certain of our personal justification; Luther's own failure to come up to his standard; present-day Protestants on Luther's main Article" on which the Church stands or falls."

4 Good Works of Theory and Practical

The Church's teaching; argue of Latter's new ideas to be sought in his early dislike for the "Latter Seints" and their delign; the peris of his theory; on the fear of that as a matrice for action. Angustine summoned as a witness on Latter's behalf; the witness decarded by Melanchthon and the Peneranians; Augustine's real view; the new dectanglished by 18th-century Protestants; Lather's atterances in favour of good world; what charity meant in the Mid-lie Ages; Lather on the hospitals of Florence. . . . pages 449-461

5. OTHER INNOVATIONS IN RELIGIOUS DOCTRONE.

Lather no systematic theologian. The regula files, Harmack on Lather's inconsequence; Paulsen on Pope Lather." Lather's teaching on the ascramenta; on infantbaptism and the faith it requires, liberal Protestants appeal to his principles against the "magical" theory of Baptism; penance an extension of baptism. Luther's teaching on the Supper; Communion merely a means of fortifying faith; Impanation versus Transubstantiation; theory of the omnipresence of Christ's body; Luther's steadfastness in his behief in the Real Presence. Attitude towards the invocation of the Saints, particularly of the Blessed Virgin. His views on Purgntory . . . pages 482-506

CONTENTS

6. LUTHER'S ATTACK ON THE SACRIFICE OF THE MASS.

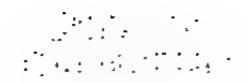

The place of this sacrifics in the Church previous to Luther's time; Luther's first attacks; the Mass suppressed at Wittenberg; his "You dem Grewel der Stillmesse"; Eck's reply; Luther undertakes to prove that the prieste' attachment to the Mass is based merely on pecuniary grounds, connection between his attack on the Mass and his theory as a whole. His work on the "Winkle-Mass"; his dispute with the devil; his defence of his work on the "Winkle-Mass"; Cochlaus replies; Luther's references to the Mass in his familiar talks, and in his Schmalkaldon "Artickel"; a profession of faith in the Real Presence pages 506-527

Google

No er e pre la

VOL. IV. THE REFORMER (II)

Origina from UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

LUTHER

CHAPTER XXI

PRINCELY MARRIAGES

1. Letther and Henry VIII of England. Bigamy instead of Divorce

In King Henry the Eighth's celebrated matrimonial controversy the Roman See by its final decision was energetically to vindicate the cause of justice, in spite of the fear that this might lead to the loss of England to Catholicism. The considered judgment was clear and definite. Rather than countenance the King's divorce from Queen Catherine, or admit bigamy as lawful, the Roman Church was prepared to see the falling away of the King and larger portion of the realm.¹

In the summer, 1531, Luther was drawn into the controversy raging round the King's marriage, by an agent of King Henry's. Robert Barnes, an English Doctor of Divinity who had apostatised from the Church and was residing at Wittenberg, requested of Luther, probably at the King's instigation, an opinion regarding the lawfulness of his sovereign's divorce.

To Luther it was clear enough that there was no possibility of questioning the validity of Catherine's marriage. It rightly appeared to him impossible that the Papal dispensation, by virtue of which Catherine of Aragon had married the King after having been the spouse of his deceased brother, should be represented as sufficient ground for a

On Clement the Seventh's earlier hesitation to come to a decision, see Ehses in "Versinsschr der Görresgesell" 1909, 3, p. 7 ff., and the works there referred to; also Paulus, "Luther und die Polygarme" (on Enders, "Luthers Briefwecksel," 9, p. 92, n.) in the "Lit. Beilage der Köln. Volkszing,," 1903, No. 48, and "Hist.-pol. Blutter," 135, 1905, p. 89 ff; Pastor, "Hist of the Popes" (Engl. trans.), 10, pp. 238-267. See below, p. 6 f divorce. This view he expressed with praiseworthy frankness in the written answer he gave Barnes.1

A 41 THE REFORMER

At the same time, however, Luther pointed out to the King a loophole by which he might be able to succeed in obtaining the object of his desire; by this concession, unfortunately, he branded his action as a pandering to the passions of an adulterous King. At the conclusion of his memorandum to Barnes he has the following: "Should the Queen be unable to prevent the divorce, she must accept the great evil and most insulting injustice as a cross, but not in any way acquiesce in it or consent to it. Better were it for her to allow the King to wed another Queen, after the example of the Patriarchs, who, in the ages previous to the law, had many wives; but she must not consent to being excluded from her conjugal rights or to forfeiting the title of Queen of England."3

It has been already pointed out that Luther, in consequence of his one-sided study of the Old Testament, had accustomed himself more and more to regard bigamy as something lawful. That, however, he had so far ever given his formal consent to it in any particular instance there is no proof. In the case of Henry VIII, Luther felt less restraint than usual. His plain hint at bigamy as a way out of the difficulty was intended as a counsel (" sugainus"). Hence we can understand why he was anxious that his opinion should not be made too public.4 When, in the same year (1581), he forwarded to the Landgrave of Hesse what purported to be a copy of the memorandum, the incriminating passage was carefully omitted.

Melanchthon, too, had intervened in the affair, and had gone considerably further than Luther in recommending

¹ To Robert Barnes, Sep. 3, 1531, "Briefwechsel," 9, pp. 27 8 At the commencement we read : "Probbitio exoras demortes fratric est positive sures, non dimes." A later revision of the opinion also under Sep. 2, soid., pp. 92-8.

[&]quot;Briefwechael," shid., p. 23. In the revision the passage still reads much the same : " Rather than eanction such a divorce I would permit the King to marry a second Queen . and, after the example of the olden Fathers and Kings, to have at the same time two consorts of Queens  (p. 63).

Boe vol. ni., p. 259. 4 "Briefwecheel," 9, p. 97 seg.
Luther's "Briefwecheel," 9, p. 91, n. 15. Cp. W. W. Rockwell, Die Doppelehe des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen," Marburg, 1904. p. 214, n. 1, and below, p. 17, n. 2.

recourse to bigamy and in answering possible objections to polygamy.

In a memorandum of Aug. 28, Melanchthon declared that the King was entirely justified in seeking to obtain the male heirs with whom Catherine had failed to present him; this was demanded by the interests of the State. He endeavours to show that polygamy is not forbidden by Divine law: in order to avoid scandal it was, however, desirable that the Kmg "should request the Pope to sanction his bigamy. permission being granted readily enough at Rome." Should the Pope refuse to give the dispensation, then the King was simply and of his own authority to have recourse to bigsiny, because in that case the Pope was not doing his duty, for he was "bound in charity to grant this dispensation." " Although I should be loath to allow polygamy generally. yet, in the present case, on account of the great advantage to the kingdom and perhaps to the King's conscience, I would say: The King may, with a good conscience (" fulsasimum est regi'), take a second unfe while retaining the first, because it is certain that polygamy is not forbidden by the Divine law, nor is it so very unusual." Melanchthon's ruthless manner of proceeding undoubtedly had a great influence on the other Wittenbergers, even though it cannot be maintained, as has been done, that he, and not Luther, was the originator of the whole theory; there are too many clear and definite earlier statements of Luther's in favour of polygamy to disprove this. Still, it is true that the lax opinion broached by Melanchthon in favour of the King of England played a great part later in the matter of the bigamy of the Landgrave of Hesse.

In the same year, however, there appeared a work on matrimony by the Lutheran theologian Johann Brenz in which, speaking generally and without reference to this particular case, he expressed himself very strongly against the lawfulness of polygamy. "The secular authorities," so Brens insists, "must not allow any of their subjects to have two or more wives," they must, on the contrary, put into motion the "penalties of the Imperial Laws " against polygumy; no pastor may " bless or ratify " such marriages, but is bound to excommunicate the offenders.1 Strange to say, the work appeared with a Preface by Luther in which, however, he neither praises nor blames this opinion.

Memorandum of Aug 23, 1831, "Corp ref.," 2, p. 820 arg : nee particularly p. 526 : Bigarny was allowable in the King's case. "propter magness strategy region of the fine region of the fine region of the fine dispensationers propter consistent debet conceders." Cp. G. Ellinge, "Phil. Melanchthon," 1802, p. 325 f., and Rockwell, shid., p. 306 f.

¹ Cp. Th. Kelde, "Zeitschr f. KG.," 13, 1892, p. 577, where he wire to the after effect of Melanchthon's memorandum, instanced in Leas, "Brisfwechiel Philipps von Hessen," 1, p. 352, and to the missial in which Bucer relied to win over the Writtenbergers to the Landgare's side ("Corp., ref.," 3, p. 851 arg.).

The Strasburg theologians, Bucer and Capito, as well as the Constance preacher, Ambrosius Blaurer, also stood up for the lawfulness of bigamy. When, however, this reached the ears of the Swiss theologians. (Ecclampadius, in a letter of Aug. 20, exclaimed: "They were inclined to consent to the King's bigamy! But far be it from us to hearken more to Mohammed in this matter than to Christ I "a

In spite of the alluring hint thrown out at Wittenberg, the adulterous King, as everyone knows, did not resort to It was Henry the Eighth's wish to be rid of his wife, and, having had her removed, he regarded himself as divorced. After the King had repudiated Catherine, Luther told his friends: "The Universities [i.e. those which sided with the English Kingl have declared that there must be a divorce. We, however, and the University of Louvain. decided differently, We [viz. Luther and Melanchthon] advised the Englishman that it would be better for him to take a concubine than to distract his country and notion: yet in the end he put her away. ""

When Clement VII declared the first marriage to be valid and indissoluble, and also refused to countenance may bigamy, Henry VIII retorted by breaking with the Church of Rome, carrying his country with him. For a while Clement had hesitated on the question of bigamy, since, in view of Cardinal Unjetan's opinion to the contrary, he found it difficult to convince himself that a dispensation could not

Wis a Eliesachen und den Fallen, so sich derhalben mitragen, rach göttlichem billigem Rechten ebristenlich zu handeln sei," 1531-

Fol. D. 2h and D. 3a. Cp. Rockwell, p. 2×1, r. 1.

The Preface reprinted in "Werke," Erl. ed. 63, p. 305.

Enders, "Luther's Briefwee isel, '9, p. 92.

Cordat is, "Tagebuch," p. 199: "Sudarmae Angla, telerabilistics et esse concubination quam" to distract his whole country and nation, • sed tandem cam repudravit " be given, and because he was personally inclined to be indulgent and friendly; finally, however, he gave Bennet, the English envoy, clearly to understand that the dispensation was not in his power to grant. That he himself was not sufficiently versed in Canon Law, the Pope repeatedly admitted. "It will never be possible to allege the attitude of Clement VII as any excuse for the Hessian affair "(Ehses) It is equally impossible to trace the suggestion of bigamy back to the opinions prevailing in medieval Catholicism. No medieval pope or confessor can be instanced who sanctioned bigamy, while there are numbers of theologians who deny the Pope's power to grant such dispensations; many even describe this negative opinion as the "acatentia communis."

Of Cardinal Cajetan, the only theologian of note on the opposite side (see above, vol. id., p. 261), W. Köhler remarks, aluding particularly to the recent researches of N. Paulus: "It never entered Cardinal Cajetan's head to deny that the ecclesiastical law categorically forbids polygamy." Further: "Like Paulus, we may unhesitatingly admit that, in this case, it would have been better for Luther had be had behind him the guiding authority of the Church."

Henry VIII, as was only natural, sought to make the best use of the friendship of the Wittenberg professors and Princes of the Schmalkaiden League, against Rome and the Emperor. He despatched an embassy, though his overtures were not as successful as he might have wished.

We may describe briefly the facts of the case.

³ Cp. Paulus in the "Hat.-pel, Bl.," 135, 1905, p. 90.

Though, of course, the heutation evinced previously by St. Augustine ("De bone conjugals," "P.L.," xl., col. 385) must not be lost night of. Note to English Edition.]

[&]quot; Cp. Paulus, shad, 147, 1911, p. 505, where he adds " And yet medieval casuatry is a leged to have been the 'determining in limited' in Luther's sanction of bigarny! Had Luther allowed himself to be guided by the medieval theory and practice, he would never have gives his consent to the Hessian bigamy."

4 "Hist, Zeitscht.," 94, 1905, p. 409 Of Clement VII, Köhler writes (ibid.) "Pope Clement VII, who had to make a stand spainet Henry VIII of England in the question of lagricy, never suggested a dispensation for a second wris, though, to all appearance, he was not convinced that such a dispensation was impossible."

⁵ "Theol. JB. für 1905," Bd. 25, p. 657, with reference to ' Hust, pol. Bl.," 135, p. 85.

The Schmalkaiden Leaguers, from the very inveption of the League, had been seeking the support both of England and of France. In 1818 they made a determined effort to bring about closer relations with Henry VIII, and, at the Schmalkaiden meeting, the initior made it known that he was not unwilling to "join the Christian League of the Electors and Princes." Hereupon he was offered the "title and standing of patron and protector of the League." The political negotiations nevertheless miscarried, owing to the King's excessive demands for the event of an attack on his Kingdom." The project of an alliance with the King of Dunmark, the Duke of Primis, and with Saxony and Hesse, for the purpose of a war against the Emperor, also came to nothing.

In those negotiations the Leaguers wanted first of all to reach an agreement with Henry in the matter of religion, whereas the latter insisted that political considerations should have the first place.

In the summer, 1535, Robert Barnes, the English plempotentiary, was raising great and exaggerated hopes in Luther's breast of Henry's making common cause with the Wittenberg reformers.

Into his plans Lather entered with great sevt, and consented to Moisnehthon's being sent to England as his representative, for the purpose of further negotiations. As we now know from a letter of recommendation of Sep. 12, 1635, first printed in 1894, he recommended Barnes to the Chancellor Bruck for an interview with the Elector, and requested permission for Melanchthon to undertake the journey to England. Joyfully he points out that "now the King offers to accept the Evangel, to join the League of our Princes and to allow our "Apologie" entry into his Kingdom." Such an opportunity must not be allowed to slip, for "the Paputa will be in high dudgeon." Quite possibly God may have something in view."

In England hopes were entertained that these favourable offers would induce a more friendly attitude towards the question of Henry's divorce. Concerning this Luther merely says in the letter cited: 'In the matter of the royal marriage, the 'surperso' has already been decided," without going into any further particulars; he, however, reserves the case to be dealt with by the theologians exclusively.

In August, 1535, Melanchthon had dedicated one of his writings to the King of England, and had, on this occasion, levished high praise on him. It was probably about this time that the King sent the presents to Wittenberg, to which Catherne Bora casually alludes in the Table-Talk. "Philip received several gifts from the Englishman, in all five hundred pieces of gold; for our own part we got at least fifty."

Mathemat, "Tuchreden," p. 106, so 1540. Cp. "Corp. ref.," 2, p. 995.

⁵ Cp. Januare, " Hust of the German People," Eng Trans. 6, pp. 1 ft. ⁵ Letter published by Th. Koide in the " Zestechr. für KG.," 14, 1994, p. 605.

Melanchthon took no offence at the cruel execution of Sir Thomas More or at the other acts of violence already perpetrated by Henry VIII; on the contrary he gave his approval to the decide of the royal tyrant, and described it as a commandment of God "to use strong measures against fanatical and godien mes." The congumery action of the English tyrant led Luther to express the wish, that a similar fate aughst befull the build of the Catholic Church at Rome. In the very year of Bishop Fisher's execution he wrote to Melanchthon: "It is easy to lose our tempers when we are what traiters, thieven, robbers, any devils incurrante the Cardinals, the Popes and their Legates are. Also that there are not more Kings of England to put them to death!" I he also refers to the alleged horrors practised by the Pope's tools in plundering the Church, and asks: "How can the Principland Lords put up with it?"

In Dec., 1035, a convention of the Schmalkelden Leaguers, at Messachthon's instance, begged the envoya despatched by Henry, who were on their way to Wittenberg, to induce their master to promote the Confession of Augsburg—unless, indeed, as they added with unusual consideration, "they and the King should be unanumous in thinking that correcting in the Confession right be improved upon or made more in accordance with the Word of Gud."

Just as in the advances made by the King to Wistenberg "the main point had been to obtain a favourable pronouncement from the German theologians in the matter of his divorce," so too in communing to discuss the Confession of Augusburg he was actuated by the thought that this would lead to a discussion on the Papal power and the question of the divorce, i.e. to those points which the King had so much at heart.

On the arrival suspectately after of the envoys at Wittenberg they had the estatection of learning from Luther and his circle, that the theologians had already changed their minds in the hings favour concerning the awfulness of marriage with a brother a widow. Owing to the influence of Omander, whom Henry VIII had won over to his aids, they now had come to regard such inarriages as contrary to the natural moral law. Hence Honry's new marriage might be considered valid. They were not, however, as yet ready to draw this last inference from [&]quot;Corp. ref.," I, p. 928. Melanchthen's language, and Luther's test, changed when, later, Henry VIII caused thuse holding Lutherns opinions to be executed. See below, p. 12 f.

^{*} Beginning of Dec., 1535. "Briefwecheel," 10, p. 275; "Utinam habitrens plures reps Anglia, qui illes occiderent /"

Corp. 101, 2, p. 1012, n. 1303. Cp. Routin-Kaweren, 2, p. 200.

A Thus G. Monte, the editor of the "W tienberger Artickel," drawn up for the envoye from England (Quedenschriften nur Gesch. des Prot.," Hft. 2, 1905), pp. 3 and 6. He points out, p. 7, that King Henry, in a reply to Wittenberg (March 12, 1526, "Corp. ref.," 3, p. 48), required "support in the question of the divorce" and desired certain things to be modified in the Confessor" and the "Applicant."

the invalidity of the previous marriage between the King and Cathering.

Lather, however, because more and more convinced that functions with a brother a videor was trivaled; in 1842, for mattance, on the assumption of the invalidity of such a uness, he unhuntatingly annualed the marrage of a certain freeze behad, as a "develop abnormation" ("abovernative diabetes").

The spoke-sean of the English massion, Bishop Edward Fox, demanded from Luther the admission that the King had separated from his first wife " on very just grounds." Luther, however, would only agree that he had done so "on very many He said later, in conversation, that his principles on Frounds. this verbal mirety had cont him three hundred builders, which he would have received from England in the event of his compriamen. He expect indeed he account of having been from declessatios-political motives, too hasty in gratify ng the King's demands in the matter of the divorce. Let, on the other hand. it is not arbitely that the desire to pave the way for a practical understanding was one of the motives for his mode of scient His previous outspoken decorations against any dissolution of the Royal marriage encipelled him to assume an attrible not too strongly at variance with his earlier opinion.

After the new marriage had taken place regulations with England continued, prin spally with the object of securing such acceptance of the new distrine no might lead to a politice religious alliance between that examiny and the Schrimbishken Leaguers. Lather, however, ataliancely refused to conceile anvining to the King in the matter of the chief districts, for matters, regarding Justification or the represent of the Mass.

The articles agreed upon at the lengthy conferences held during the early months of 1576—and reads public only in 1905 (see above, p. 0, n. 4)—failed to satisfy the King, although they displayed a very conclusiony quit. Melanchillan outlid himself in his andeavour to reader the Wittenberg teaching

On Feb. 16, 1542, "Hriofe," ed. Du Wette, 5, p. 436. Op. strd., p. 584, Letter of Jan. 18, 1545.

" Mathenius, "Tinchredon," p. 158, in 1540,

I For full particulars concerning the change, see Rockwell, let. 2st 214 ft. The latter says, p. 217; "Luther's opinion obviously changed [before March 12, 1536]. . . . Yet he expressed himself even in 1536 against the discore [H cry the Eighth a , the provides a tel marriage with a sever n law from which the M are Law election to tel marriage with a dispensed, whereas the prohibition of divorce could not be dispensed, and, p. 22b. In the change of 1.4b the industry of Osmader is minimataltable. . . Crarmer, when at Ratisbon in 1521, had rented Unimiter exercal traces at history level much in all more him ever to the side of the King of England. At the end Rockwell sums up as follows (p. 223). "The expedient of bigamy . . . was approved by Latter, Melanetthem, Granena, Henry and Up its, but a producted by Geolempadius and Ewingli. Hence we cannot be surprised that Lather, Melanelition and Bucer should regard favourably the Hemana proposal of bigamy, whereas Zwingu's successors at Zurah, and Bullinger and Gualther, opposed it more or less openly."

acceptable. "It is true that the main points of faith were not merificed," remarks the discoverer and editor of the acticles in question, " but the desire to please noticesble in their form, even in such questions as those concerning the importance of good works, monasteries, etc., is nevertheless surprising.' Luther himself, in a letter of April 29, 1536, to the Electoral Vice-Chancellor Burkhard, spoke of the concessions made in these articles as the final limit: to go further would be to concede to the King of England what had been refused to the Pope and the Emperor ; " at Augsburg (in 1830) we might have come to terms more carrily with the Pope and the Emperor, any, pechaps we might do so even now." To enter into an ecclematico-political aliance with the English would, he considers, he "dangerous," for the Schmalkekien Leaguers " were not all of one mand ... hence the (theological) articles ought first to be accepted; the League was, however, a secular matter and therefore he would beg the "beloved Lords and my Gracious Master to consider." whether they could accept it without a previous agreement being reached on the point of theology. 4

Though Luther and the Princes set great store on the projected alliance, on account of the increase of strength it would have brought the German Evangelicals, yet their hopes were to be shuttered, for the articles above referred to did not find acceptance in England. Luther was later on to declare that everything had come to nought because King Henry wished to be head of the Protestants in Germany, which the Elector of Saxony would not permit: "Let the deviltake the great Lords! This rogue (" is nobilo") wanted to be proclaimed head of our religion, but to this the Elector would in no wise agree; we did not even know what sort of belief he had." Probably the King demanded a paramount influence in the Schmalkalden League, and the German Princes were loath to be deprived of the direction of affairs.

After all hopes of an agreement had vanished Henry VIII made no secret of his antipathy for the Lutheran teaching.

The quondam Defender of the Faith even allowed himself to be earried away to acts of bloodshed. In 1540 he caused Luther's friend, Robert Barnes, the agent already referred to, to be burnt at the stake as a heretic. Barnes had adopted the Lutheran doctring of Justification. It was not on this account alone, however, that he was obnoxious to the King, but also because the latter had grown weary of Anne of Cleves, whom Barnes and Thomas Cromwell, the King's favounte, had given him as a fourth consort, after Anne Bolevn and Jane Seymour. Cromwell, though not favourably disposed to Lutheranism, was executed a few days before. On April 9, 1586, Luther had written to Cromwell a very polite letter, couched in general terms, in answer to a courteous missive from that statesman handed to him by Barnes. From Luther's letter we see that Cromwell " had been described to him in too favourable a light." as though predisposed to the Lutheran doctrine or to regard Luther as a divinely sent teacher. Luther deceived himself. if he fancied that Cromwell was ready to "work for the cause "; the latter remained as unfriendly to Latheranism proper as the King himself.

¹ Ments, for cir., p. 11.

^{* &}quot; Works," Ect. ed. 52, p. 133 (" Bra (weelnet," 10, p. 327).

Mathesan, "Tuchreden, p. 174, m 1540.

In the year of Barnes's execution Melanchthon wrote the letter to Veit Dietrich in which he expresses the pious wish. that God would send a brave murderer to bring the King to the end he deserved.

Luther, on his side, declared: "The devil himself rides astride this King"; "I am glad that we have no part in his blasphemy." He boasted, so Luther says, of being head of the Church of England, a title which no bishop, much less a King, had any right to, more particularly one who with his erew had "vexed and tortured Christ and His Church."4 In 1540 Luther spoke sareastically of the King's official title: "Under Christ the supreme head on earth of the English Church," * remarking, that, in that case. "even the angels are excluded." Of Mclanchthon's dedication of some of his books to the King, Lather says, that this had been of little service. "In future I am not going to dedicate any of my books to anyone. It brought Philip no good in the case of the bishop [Albert of Mayence], of the Englishman, or of the Hessian [the Landgrave Philipl."7 Still more fierce became his hatred and disappointment when he found the King consorting with his aworn enemies, Duke George, and Albert, Elector of Mayence.*

* Ibid., p. 198.

[&]quot; Briefwechsel," 10, p. 324. ¹ Ibid., p. 326, ^{*} Kostln-Kaweran, 2, p. 400, with reference to Corp. ref, "3, p. 1076.

* Colloq.," ed. Bindseil, 1 p. 537, where the words have been transferred to July 10, 1539.

^{*} Cp. "Corp ref., 2,p. 1029. * Ibid., p. 145.

^{*} Mathesius, "Tischreden," p. 178.

When he heard the news of Barnes having been cast into prison, he said: "This King wants to make himself God. He lays down articles of faith and forbids marriage under pain of death, a thing which even the Pope scrupled to do. I am something of a prophet and, as what I prophesy comes true, I shall refrain from saying more."

Luther never expressed any regret regarding his readiness to humour the King's lusts or regarding his suggestion of bigamy.

The Landgrave Philip of Hesse, however, referred directly to the proposal of bigamy made to the King of England, when he requested Luther's consent to his own project of taking a second wife. The Landgrave had got to hear of the proposal in spite of the unlucky passage having been struck out of the deed.

The history of the Hessian bigamy is an incident which throws a curious light on Luther's exceptional indulgence towards princely patrons of the Evangel in Germany.

2. The Bigamy of Philip of Hosse

As early as 1526 Philip of Hesse, whose conduct was far from being conspicuous for morality, had submitted to Luther the question whether Christians were allowed to have more than one wife. The Wittenberg Professor gave a reply tallying with his principles as already desembed; a instead of pointing out clearly that such a thing was divinely forbidden to all Christians, was not to be dispensed from by any earthly authority, and that such extra marriages would be entirely invalid, Luther refused to admit unconditionally the invalidity of such unions. Such marriages, he stated, gave scandal to Christians, "for without due cause and necessity even the old Patriarchs did not take more than one wife"; it was incumbent that we should be able "to appeal to the Word of God" but no such Word existed in favour of polygamy, "by which the same could

For Luther's previous statements in favour of polygamy, see vol. iii., p. 259 ff.; and above, p. 4.

Google

Mathesius, "Tischreden," p. 145. On account of his crueity he says of Henry VIII, in Aug., 1540. "I look upon him not as a man but as a devil incarnate. He has added to his other crumes the execution of the Chancelor Cromwell, whom, a few days previously, he had made Lord Chief Justice of the Kingdom" (1514., p. 174).

14 LUTHER THE REFORMER

be proved to be well pleasing to God in the case of Christians "; "hence I am unable to recommend it, but would rather dissuade from it, especially for Christians, unless some great necessity existed, for instance were the wife to contract leprosy or become otherwise unfit." It is not clear whether Philip was interested in the matter for personal reasons, or simply because some of his subjects were believers in polygamy.

Luther's communication, far from diverting the Prince from his project, could but serve to make him regard it as feasible; provided that the "great necessity" obtained and that he had "the Word of God on his side," then the step could "not be prevented". By duit of a judicious interpretation of Scripture and with expert theological aid, the obstacles might easily be removed.

The Hessian Prince also became acquainted with Luther's statements on bigamy in his Commentary on Genesis published in the following year. To them the Landgrave Philip appealed expressly in 1540; the preacher Anton Corvinus having suggested that he should deny having committed bigamy, he replied indignantly: "Since you are so afraid of it, why do you not suppress what Luther wrote more than ten years ago on Genesis; did he and others not write publicly concerning bigamy: "Advise it I do not, forbid it I cannot!" If you are allowed to write thus of it publicly, you must expect that people will act up to your teaching."

The question became a pressing one for Luther and began to east a shadow over his wayward and utterly untraditional interpretation of the Bible, when, in 1589, the Landgrave resolved to take as an additional wife, besides Christian the daughter of George of Saxony, who had now grown distasteful to him, the more youthful Margeret von der Sale. From Luther Margeret's mother desired a favourable pronouncement, in order to be able with a good conscience to give her consent to her daughter's wedding.

<sup>To Philip of Hesse, Nov. 28, 1526, "Briefwechsel," 5, p. 411 L.
"Priefwechsel des A. Corvinus," ed. Tschackert, 1900, p. 81,</sup>

Philip Seeks the Permission of Wittenberg

Early in Nov., 1589, Gereon Sailer, an Augsburg physician famous for his skill in handling venereal cases, who had treated the Landgrave at Cassel, was sent by Philip to Bucer at Strasburg to instruct the latter to bring the matter before the theologians of Wittenberg. Sailer was a friend of the innovations, and Bucer was highly esteemed by the Landgrave as a theologian and clever diplomatist.

Bucer was at first sorely troubled in conscience and hesitated to undertake the commission. Sailer reported to the Landgrave that, on hearing of the plan, he had been "quite horrified" and had objected "the scandal such an innovation in a matter of so great importance and difficulty might cause among the weak followers of the Evangel."1 After thinking the matter over for three days Bucer, however, agreed to visit the Landgrave on Nov. 16 and receive his directions. A copy of the secret and claborate instructions given him by Philip concerning the appeal he was to make to Luther still exists in the handwriting of Simon Bing, the Hessian Secretary, in the Marburg Archives together with several old copies, as also the original rough draft in Philip's own hand. The envoy first betook himself to the meeting of the Schmalkalden Leaguers, held at Arnstadt on Nov. 20, to confer upon a new mission to be sent to England; on Dec. 4 he was at Weimar with the Elector of Saxony and on the 9th he had reached Wittenberg.

The assenting answer given by Luther and Melanchthon. bears the date of the following day.4 It is therefore quite true that the matter was settled "in haste," as indeed the text of the reply states. Bucer doubtless did his utmost to

¹ "Briefwechsel Landgraf Philipps des Groumütigen von Hessen. met Bucer, hg und erlauters von Max Lenz " (* Puhl kationen aus den Kgl preuse Stantearchiven, Bd 5, 24 und 47 = 1, 2 3), 1, 1880, p. 345. Cp. N. Paulus, "Die hessische Doppelehe im Urteile der protest. Zeitgenossen." "Hist -pol. El.," 147, 1911 (p. 503 ff. 56) ff.) p. 504

^{*} We quote the instructions throughout from the most reliable edition, viz. that in "Luthers Briefwechse.," 12 (1910 p. 301 ff.), which G Kawerau continued and published after the death of Enders.

* "Philippa Briefwechsel," ed. Lenz, 1, p. 352

* Box given in "Luthers Briefwechsel," 12, p. 319 ff. Cp. "Luthers Werks," Erl. ed., 55, p. 25t ff.; "Briefe," ed. Le Wette, 5, p. 237, which gives only the Latin version; "Corp. ref.," 3, p. 851 seg., "Hat.-pol. H...," 18, 1846, p. 236 ff.

prevent the theologians from having recourse to subterfuge or delay.

The above-mentioned instructions contain a sad account of the "dire necessity" which seemed to justify the second marriage: The Landgrave would otherwise be unable to lead a moral life; he was urged on by deep distress of conscience; not merely did he endure temptations of the flesh beyond all measure, but, so runs his actual confession, he was quite unable to refrain from "formeation, unchastity and adultery." The confession dealt with matters which were notorious. It also contains the admission, that he had not remained true to his wife for long, in fact not for more than "three weeks"; on account of his sense of sin he had "not been to the Sacrament." As a matter of fact he had abstained from Communion from 1526 to 1589, vis. for thirteen years, and until his last attack of the veneral disease.

But were the scruples of conscience thus detailed to the Wittenbergers at all real? Recently they have been characterised as the "outcome of a bodily wreck."

"I am unable to practise self-restraint," Philip of Hesse had declared on another occasion, "I am forced to commit formeation or worse, with women." His sister Elisabeth had already advised him to take a concubine in place of so many prostitutes. In all probability Philip would have abducted Margaret von der Sale had he not hoped to obtain her in marriage through the intervention of her relations and with Luther's consent. A Protestant historian has recently pointed this out when dealing with Philip's alleged "distress of conscience."

Bucer was well able to paint in dismal hues the weakness of his princely client; he pointed out, "how the Landgrave, owing to his wife's deficiencies, was unable to remain chaste; how he had previously lived so and so, which was neither good nor Evangelical, especially in one of the mainstays of the party." In that very year Philip of Hesse had, as a matter of fact, been along from a certain

1 " Luthers Briefwechiel," 13, p. 301.

W Köhler, "Die Doppelche des Landgrafen Philipp von Heisen."

('Histor, Zeitschri, '94, 1995, p. 385 ff.), p. 309, 400

Luther's letter, June, 1540, to the Elector of Saxony (below, p. 37) ed. Seidemann from a Kiel MS. in his edition of "Lauterbacks Tagesbuch," p. 196 ff.

mainly brought upon him by his excesses; he himself snoke of it as a " severe attack of the French sickness [syphilis], which is the penalty of an immoral life."

True to his instructions, Burey went on to any that the Landgrave had firmly "resolved" to make use against his uncharity-which he neither could nor would refrain from with his present wife-of " such means as God permitted and did not forbid," van to wed a second wife. The two Wattenbergers had perforce to beten while Bucer as the mouthween of the Landgrave, put forth as the grounds of his elect a first resolve the very proofs from Scripture which they themselves had adduced in favour of polygamy; they were informed that, according to the tenor of a memorandum, "both Lutier and Philip had enumeried the King of England not to divorce his first wife, but rather to take another . It was accordingly the Landgrave s draws that they should "give testimone" that his deed was not uniast, and that they should "make known in the press and from the pulpit what was the right entire to pursue in such esecumatances"; should they have accepted about doing this for fear of scandal or evil consequences, they were at least to give a declaration in writing: "That were I to do it secretly, yet I should not offend God, but that they regard it as a real marriage, and would meanwhile device ways and means whereby the matter might be brought openly before the world. ; otherwas, the instructions proceeded, the "wench "whom the Prince was about to tage to himself might complain of being looked upon as an improper person. as "nothing can ever be kept serret." "great scandal" would indeed arise were not the true state of the case known. Boudes, he fully intended to retain his present wife and to consider her as a rightful spouse, and her children alone were to be the "lewful princes of the land"; nor would he sek for any more wives beyond this second one. The Landgrave even piously reminds Luther and Metanchthon ' not to head overmuch the opinion of the world, and human respect, but to look to God and what He has commanded or forbidden, bound or locsened "; he, for his part, was determined not to "remain any longer in the bonds of the devil."

Philip was careful aim to remind them that, if, after putting into amerition his project, he was able to "live and die with a good conscience," he would be " all the more free to fight for the

University O

^{1.4} Thus Philip to his friend, Duke Ulrich of Wartemberg Oct., 1849, when evolving to obtain his agreement to the begann. Ulrich, however, advised him to give up the project, which would be a great blow to the Evengel. F. L. Hoyd, "Ulrich, Herzog von Warttemberg," 5 v. 224 ff.

terry," 3, p. 226 ff.

Op. above, p. 2 ff., also Enders' "Lethern Busineshed," 12 p. 200, where it is pointed out that in the copy of the letter to heavy V111 tent to Hesse (ibid., 8, p. 21 ff.) the passage in cuestion concerning biguing was consisted, the Landgrave Philip, however, learnt the contents of the passage, doubtless from Busin.

Evangelical cause as befitted a Christian '; "whatever they [Luther and Memachthon] shall tell me is right and Christian-whether it refers to monastic property or to other mattersthat they will find me ready to carry out at their beheat." On the other hand, as an urgent motive for giving their consent to his plan, he broadly hinted, that, " should he not get any help from them " he would, " by means of an intermediary, seek permanen of the Emperor, even though it should cost me a lot of money", the Emperor would in all likelihood do nothing without a "dispensation from the Pope"; but in such a matter of conscionce neither the Pope nor the Emperor were of any great account, alone he was convinced that his "design was approved by God ', still, their coment (the Pope and Emperor's) would help to overcome " human respect "; hence, should be be unable to obtain "consolation from this party (the Evangeneal L' the sanction of the other party was "not to be despised." Concorning the request he felt impelled to address to the Emperor, he asys, in words which seem to convey a threat, that although he would not for any reason on earth prove untrue to the Evangel, or aid in the undaught on the Evangelial cause, yet, the Imperial party might "use and bind " him to do things " which would not be to the advantage of the cause." Hence, it was in their interest to assist him in order that he might "not be forced to seek help in quarters where he had no wish to look for it."

After again stating that he "took his stand on the Word of God" he concludes with a request for the desired "Christian, written" testimony, "in order that thereby I may amend my life, go to the Sacrament with a good conscience and further all the affairs of our religion with greater freedom and contentment. Given at Milsungen on the Sunday post Catharine anno etc. 39."

The Wittenberg theologians now found themselves in a quandary. Luther says: "We were greatly taken aback at such a declaration on account of the frightful scandal which would follow." Apart from other considerations, the Landgrave had already been married sixteen years and had a number of sons and dang iters by his wife; the execution of the project would also necessarily lead to difficulties at the Courts of the Duke of Saxony and of the Elector, and also, possibly, at that of the Duke of Würtemberg. They were unaware that Margaret von Sole had already been chosen as a second wife, that Philip had secured the consent of his wife Christina, and that the way for a acttlement with the bride's mother had already been

^{*} Letter of Lather to the Electer of Sexony - See above, p. 16, p. 3, and below, p. 37 f.

The view taken by Rockwell, viz. that the form of the memorandum to be signed by Luther and Melanchthon had already been drawn up in Hesse by order of Philip, is, however, erroneous; nor was the document they signed a copy of such a druft.*

It is much more likely that the lengthy favourable reply of the Wittenbergers was composed by Mclanchthon. It was signed with the formula: "Wittenberg, Wednesday after St. Nicholas, 1589. Your Screne Highness's willing and obedient servants [and the signatures] Martinus Luther, Philippus Melanchthon, Martinus Bucerus."3 The document is now among the Marburg archives.

Characteristically enough the idea that the Landgrave is, and must remain, the protector of the new religious system appears at the commencement as well as at the close of the document, The agreatories begin by congratulating the Prince, that God " has again helped him out of sickness," and pray that heaven may preserve him, for the "poor Church of Christ is small and forsaken, and indeed stands in need of pious lords and governors"; at the end God is again implored to guide and direct him; above al., the Landgrave must have nothing to do with the Imperialists.

The rest of the document, apart from pious admonstions, connets of the declaration, that they give their " testimony that, in a case of accessity," they were "unable to condemn " bigamy, and that, accordingly, his " conscience may be at rest" abould the Landgrave " utilise " the Divine dispensation. In se many words they sanction the request submitted to them, because " what was permitted concerning matrimony in the Mosaic Law was not prohibited in the Gospel." Concerning the circumstances of the request they, however, declined "to give anything in print," because otherwise the matter would be "understood and accepted as a general law and from it (i.e. a general seaction of polygency) much greve scendel and complaint would arms." The Landgrave's wish that they should speak of the case from the pulpit, is also passed over in allence. Nor did they reply to his invitation to them to consider by what ways and means the matter might be brought publicly before the world.

Cp W W Rockwell, "Die Doppelehe des Leadgrafen Philipp von Hemen, " Marburg, 1904, p. 10 ff

³ This error has been confuted by Th. Brieger on good grounds in the 'Untersuchungen wher Luther und die Neuensbeden Landgrafen Ph hpp," in "Zorische f. K.G., " 29. p. 174 ff., shid., p. 401 ff. " Hist. Jahrb.," 26, 1905, p. 406 (N. Paulue).

* Dec, 10, 1539, " Luthers Briefwechoef," 12, p. 326.

On the contrary they apores to be intent on burying in discreet mence a marriage so distanteful to them. It even looks as though they were simple enough to think that such concealment would be possible, even in the long rus. What they feer is, above all, the commonweres of its becoming common property. In no way, is they declare, was any universal low, any "public precedent possible, whereby a plurality of wives might be made lawful, according to its original matriction marriage had aignified "the union of two persons only, not of more "; but, in view of the examples of the Old Covenant, they "were unable to condemn it," if, in a quite exceptional case, "precises were had to a dispersation . . . and a man, with the advice of his pastor, took another wife, not with the object of introducing a low, but to entirely his weed."

As for instances of such permanon having been given in the Church, they were able to quote only two. First, the purely legendary case of Count Ernest of Gleschen-then still regarded as historical-who, during his captivity among the Turks in 1228, had married his master's daughter, and, then, after his escape, and after having learnt that his wife was still dving, applied for and obtained a Papai discension for leganity. accordly, the alleged practice in cases of prolonged and incural to timess, such as leprosy, to permit, occasionally, the man to take another wife. The latter, however, can only refer to Luther a own practice or to that followed by the trackers of the new forth.4 In 1925 Lather had informed the Landgrave that this was allowable in case of "dire necessity" " for instance, where the wife was legrous, or had been otherwise rendered unfit. I Acting upon this theory he was seen to give a decision in a particular case," in May or June, 1340, he even stated that he had erveral times, when one of the parties had contracted Improvy, pravalely anactioned the bigomy of the healthy party, whether man or woman.4

They are at great pains to impress on the Landgrave that he must "take every possible case that this matter he not made public in the world," otherwise the convenience would be taken as a precedent by others, and also would be made to serve as a weapon against them and the Evangel." "Hence, neeing his great arandal would be caused, we humbly beg your herene highness to take this matter into serious consideration."

They also adments him " to avoid forestation and adultery "; they had learnt with "great across" that the Landgrave " was burdened with such evil bate, of which the consequences to be found were the Divise pussionest, illness and other perish"; such conduct, outside of matricesty, was " to small an —as they proceed to prove from Scripture; they reported, however, that the Prince felt "pain and remove " for what he had done. Although menogamy was in accordance with the original inetitation of marriage, yet it was their duty to tell him that," enough that your Screen Highment has informed us that you are not also to refrain from an interioral life, we would eather that your Highment should be in a better state before God, and are with a good conscience for your lightness a even selvation and the good of your land and people. And, as your ference Highment has determined to take another wile, we consider that this should be kept nearth, to less than the dispensation, viz. that your ference highmen and the lady in question, and a few other trustworthy persons, should be approach of your Highment's conscience and state of mind in the way of confession."

^{[*} Unless the reference be to certain reputed consults of Gregory II or of Alexander III. Up. *P L., "Innue, 525, and Decr IV, 15, or Note to English Ed.]

^{*} See above, p. 14.

* Op Luther's "Consideration" dated Aug 21 1527 concerning the husband of a leprous wife "Werke" Eri ed 33, p. 446 (Per-f. werked "8, p. 36), where he save "I can in no wise present him or fertied his taking another wedded wife." He here taken for granted the consent of the leprous party. * Mathemas, "I metredon, " p. 141.

"From this," they continue, " so great going or considel will result, for it is not unusual for Prisons to keep ' concubiance,' and, though not everyone is aware of the circumstances, yet remonable people will hear this in mind and be better planned with such a manner of life than with adultery or dissolute and immoral living,"

Yet, once again, they point out that, were the bigamy to become a matter of public knowledge, the opinion would gain ground that polygamy was perfectly lawful to all, and that everyone might follow the precedent; the result would also be that the ensures of the Evengel would by out that the Evengels which the animal that the Evengels which the animal that the Evengels which the polygamists and, in fact, just the same as the Turisa. Further, the great Lords would be the first to give the example to private persons to do likewise. As it was, the Hemian aristoctory was bed enough, and many of its members were strongly exposed to the Evengel on earthly grounds, these would become still more hostile were the bigamy to become publicly known. Lastly, the Prince must bear in mind the injury to his good name "which the tolings of his act would come assumpt foreign potentates.

A paragraph appended to the memorandum is, according to recent investigation, from Luther's own per and, at any rate, is quite in his style. It refers to Philip's threat to seek the Emperor's intervention, a step which would not have been at al. to the taste of the Wittenbergers, for it was obvious that this would eripple Philip's action as Protector of the Evangelicals. This menace had plainly excited and troubled Luther. He declares in the concluding sentences, that the Emperor before whom the Prince threatened to lay the case, was a man who looked upon adultery as a small sin; there was great reason to fear that he shared the faith of the Pope, Cardinals, Italians, Spaniards and Saracens; he would pay no heed to the Prince's request but only use him as a cat's-paw. They had found him out to be a false and faithless man, who had forgotten the true German spirit. The Emperor, as the Landgrave might see for himself, did not trouble himself about any Christian concerns, left the Turks unopposed and was only interested in fomenting plots in Germany for the increase of the Burgundian power. Hence it was to be hoped that pious German Princes would have nothing to do with his faithless practices.

³ Cp. the remarks in ⁴ Luthers Briefwecheel, ¹¹ 12, p. 327 f., and Brieger, les. set., p. 101.

Such are the contents of Luther and Melanchthon's written reply. Bucer, glad of the success achieved, at once proceeded with the memorandum to the Electoral Court.

This theological document, the like of which had never been seen, is unparalleled in the whole of Church history. Seldom indeed has exceptical waywardness been made to serve a more momentous purpose. The Elector, Johann Frederick of Saxony, was, at a later date, quite hornfied, as he said, at "a business the like of which had not been heard of for many ages." Sidonie, the youthful Duchess of Saxony, complained subsequently, that, "since the Birth of Christ, no one had done such a thing." Bucer's fearn had not been groundless "of the scandal of such an innovation in a matter of so great importance and difficulty among the weak followers of the Evangel."

Besides this, the sanction of bigamy given in the document in question is treated almost as though it denoted the commencement of a more respectable mode of life incapable of giving any "particular scandal", for amongst the common people the newly wedded wife would be looked upon as a concubine, and such it was quite usual for Princes to keep. Great stress is laid on the fact that the sceret bigamy would prevent adultery and other immorably. Apart, however, from these circumstances, the sanctioning, largely on the strength of political considerations, of an exception to the universal New-Testament prohibition, is painful. Anyone, however desirous of finding extenuating circumstances for Luther's decision, can scarcely fail to be shocked at this fact. The only excuse that might be advanced would be, that Philip, by his determination to take this step and his threat of becoming reconciled to the Emperor, exercised pressure tantamount to violence, and that the weight of years, his scorn for the Church's matrimonial legislation and his excessive regard for his own interpretation of the Old Testament helped Luther to signify his assent to a plan so portentous.

Seckendorf, "Commentarius de Luthersnamo," 3, 1994, p. 278.
 E. Brandenburg, "Postache Korrespondenz des Hersogs Moritz von Sachsen," 2, 1903, p. 191

^{*} barier to Philip of Heme, Nov. 6, 1539, "Briefwechsel Philipps," 1, p. 346; above, p. 15. Other similar statements by contemporaries are to be found in the article of N. Paulus (above, p. 15, n. 1).

The Bigamy is Consummated and made Public.

The object of Bucer's hasty departure for the Court of the Elector Johann Frederick of Saxony was to dispose him favourably towards the impending marriage. In accordance with his instructions from Hesse, he was to submit to this Prince the same arguments which had served him with the two Wittenbergers, for the superscription of the instructions ran: "What Dr. Martin Bucer is to demand of D. Martin Luther and Philip Melanchthon, and, should he see fit, after that also of the Elector." In addition to this he had in the meantime received special instructions for this delicate mission to Weimar.

The Landgrave looked upon an understanding with the Elector as necessary, not merely on account of his relationship with him and out of consideration for Christina his first wife, who belonged to the House of Saxony, but also on account of the ecclesiastico-political alliance in which they stood, which made the Elector's support seem to him quite as essential as the sanction of the Wittenberg theologiams.

Bucer treated with Johann Frederick at Weimar on 15 or 16 Dec. and reached some sort of understanding, as we learn from the Elector's written reply to the Landgrave bearing the latter date. Bucer represents him as saying: If it is impossible to remove the scandal caused by the Landgrave's life in any other way, he would ask, as a Luthers Briefwechsel," 12, p. 301,

 "Philippa Briefwechsel," 1, p. 356 ff., and Burkhardt, "Luthers Briefwechsel," p. 388.

brother, that the plan should not be executed in any other way than "that contained in our—Dr. Luther's, Philip's and my own—writing"; upon this he was unable to improve; he was also ready to "lend him fraternal assistance in every way" should any complications arise from this step.\(^1\) In return, in accordance with the special instructions given to Bucer, he received from the Landgrave various political concessions of great importance: viz. support in the matter of the Duke of Cleves, help in his difficulties about Magdaburg, the eventual renunciation of Philip's title to the inheritance of his father-in-law, Duke George, and, finally, the promise to push his claims to the Imperial crown after the death of Charles V, or in the event of the partitioning of the Empire.

The Elector, like his theologians, was not aware that the "lady" (she is never actually named) had already been chosen. Margaret von der Sale, who was then only seventeen years of age, was the daughter of a lady-in-waiting to Philip's sister, El sabeth, Duchess of Rochlitz. Her mother, Anna von der Sule, an ambitious lady of the lower nobility, had informed the Landgrave that she must stipulate for certain privileges. As soon as Philip had received the replies from Wittenberg and Weimar, on Dec. 28, 1589, the demands of the mother were at once settled by persons vested with the necessary authority. Even before this, on the very day of the negotiations with Luther, Dec. 11, the Landgrave and his wife Christina had each drawn up a formal deed concerning what was about to take place: Christma agreed to Philip's "taking another wedded wife." and promised that she would never on that account be unfriendly to the Landgrave, his second wife, or her children; Philip pledged numself not to countenance any claim to the Landgraviate on the part of any usue by the second wife during the lifetime of Christing's two sons, but to provide for such issue by means of territories situated outside his own dominions 2. Such was the assurance with which he proceeded towards the cherished goal.

Several Hessian theologians of the new fuith, for instance, the preacher Dionysius Melander, a personal friend of the Landgrave's, and Johann Lening were on his side.³ To the Philippi Briefweelsel," 1, p. 308. Cp. Rockwell, ibid., p. 30.

 Rockwell, ibid., p. 31.
 Ibid., p. 37

memorandum composed by Luther and Melanchthon the signatures of both the above-mentioned were subsequently added, as well as those of Anton Corvinus, then paster at Witzenhausen, of Adam Fuldensis (Kraft), then Superintendent at Marburg, of Justus Winther—since 1582 Court Schoolmaster at Cassel and, from 1542, Superintendent at Rotenburg on the Fulda—and of Balthasar Rhaide (Raid), paster at Hersfeld, who, as Imperial Notary, certified the marriage. The signature of the last was, however, subsequently crased.³

About the middle of Jan., 1540, Philip informed the more prominent Councillors and theologians that he would soon carry out his project. When everything was ready the marriage was celebrated on March 4 in the Castle of Rotenburg on the Fulda by the Court Chaplain, Dionystus Melander, in the presence of Bucer and Melanchthon; were also present the Commandant of the Wartburg, Eberhard von der Thann, representing the Elector of Saxony, Pastor Balthasar Rhaide, the Hessian Chancellor Johann Feire of Lichtenau, the Marshal Hermann von Hundelshausen, Rudolf Schenk zu Schweinsberg (Landvogt of Eschwege on the Werra), Hermann von der Malsburg, a nobleman, and the mother of the bride, Anna von der Sale.* The draft of the short discourse still exists with which the Landgrave intended to open the ceremony. Melander delivered the formal wedding address. On the following day Melanchthon handed the Landgrave an "admonition," i.e. a sort of petition, in which he warmly recommended to his care the welfare of education. It is possible that when summoned,to Rotenburg from a meeting of the Schmalkalden League at which he had been assisting, he was unaware of the object of the invitation. Subsequent explanations, furnished at the last moment, by Melander and Lening, seem to have drawn a protest from Melanchthon which roused the anger of the two preachers. This shows that "everything did not pass off smoothly at Rotenburg." Both were, not long after, stigmatised by Melanchthon as " incruditi homines " and made chiefly responsible for the lax principles of the Landgrave. Luther tried later to represent Lening, the ³ "Luthers Briefwechsel," 12, pp. 326 and 328.

Rockwell, ibid., p. 43.
 Molarchthon to Camerarius, Sep. 1, 1540, first fully published by Rockwell, ibid., p. 194.

"monster," as the man by whom the idea of the bigamy, a source of extreme embarrassment to the Wittenbergers, had first been hatched.1

Although the Landgrave was careful to preserve secrecy concerning the new marriage-already known to so many persons.—permitting only the initiate to visit the "lady." and even forbidding her to attend Divine Worship, still the news of what had taken place soon leaked out. " Palpable signs appeared in the building operations commenced at Weissenstein, and also in the despatch of a cask of wine to Luther."3 At Weissenstein, in the former monastery near Cassel, now Wilhelmshohe, an imposing residence was fitted up for Margaret von der Sale. In a letter of May 24, 1540, to Philip. Luther expresses his thanks for the mit of wine: "I have received your Serene Highness's present of the cask of Rhine wine and thank your Serene Highness most humbly. May our dear Lord God keep and preserve you body and soul. Amen." Katey also received a gift from the Prince, for which Luther returned thanks on Aug. 22, though without mentioning its nature.4 On the cask of wine and its destination the Schultheiss of Lohra spoke "openly before all the peasants," so Anton Corvinus. informed the Landgrave on May 25, saying that: "Your Serene Highness has taken another wife, of which he was perfectly sure, and your Screne Highness is now sending a eask of wine to Luther because he gave your Serene Highness permission to do such a thing."4

On June 9 Jones wrote from Wittenberg, where he was staying with Luther-who himself was as silent as the tomb-to George of Anhalt : Both in the Meissen district and at Wittenberg there is "much goes p" ('ingens fame') of biginny with a certain von Sale, though, probably, it was only "question of a concubrac."

Luther to the Landgrave, Aug. 22, 1540, Philipps Briefwecheel, "

1, p. 389.
2 "Beschwechsel des Corvinus," (see p. 14, n. 2), p. 79. Paulus, ebid., p. 6ade Briefwechnet des Jonas," ed. G. Kuwerau, 1, p. 394.

To Justus Montus, Jan. 10, 1542, "Briefe," ed. De Wette, 5, p. 426. To Chancellor Bruck, ason after Jan. 10, 1542, ibid., 4, p. 296. Melanthe then wrote to Yest Dietrich on Dec. 11, 1541, concerning Leming "Monatrosa corpore el anima est."

^{*} Thus Rockwell, while, p. 48 f.

* "Philippe Briefwechsel," 1 p. 362 f. Rockwell's statement, p. 45, that Luther had been offered 200 Golden by the Landgrave as a present. but how refused the gift, is, in both a mances, founded on a misuadorstanding. Cp. N. Paulus, "Hist. Jahrb.," 1905, p. 405

Five days inter, however, he relates, that "at Wursburg and termine (Cutholic) keralitars the Papets and Canons were es-pressing huge delight" over the bigamy,4

The bulgayour of the Landgrave a meter had below to aprend the nove. Un March 13 the Language, through Marshal you Bundrishausen, had informed the inster of the fact, on he had formally promund Margaret a mother to do. The "tody began to weep, made a great outery and abused Lather and Horer on a pair of incornate aramps "4. She was unable to reconcile herself to the bigning or to refram from complaining to others. "My magry sector has been unable to hold her tongue, "wrote the Landgrove Philip on June 8.* The Dural Court of Sanony at Democa was as assign for reliable information. Duke Heavy was a patron of Latheranism, but one of the motivus for his curiously in the matter is to be found in the fact that the Landgrave was ciniming a portion of the inheritance of the late Duke George, who had used on April 17, 1829. In accordance with Henry a prices. Anna was der liels, as a subject of the lieunn duchy, was removed by force on June 2 from her residence at Hebunfeld and earned to Demine. There the mether confessed everything and declared, not without pride, that her doughter Margaret as much the rightful wife of the Landgrave as Christian. 14 About Whiteum the Landgrave personally admitted the fact to Maurice of Bexchy.

The Court of Dressien at once informed the Elector of Saxony of do dupperry and of the very unformeshe manner in which the news had been received, and the latter, in turn, communiented it, through Chancellor Bruck, to Lether and Melanchthon.

The Elector Johann Frederick, in view of the change of circumstances, became gure and more vessel with the marriage. To a cornam extent he stood under the influence of Etiesbeth Duchess of Nochists. In his case, too, the question of property played a part, vis. whether, is view of the understanding existing between Hence and Second as to the succession, the children of the second wife were to become the bein in the event of the death of the children of the first unio, this being what the Landgrave demanded. Above all, however, the continue Elector was anxious about the attitude of the Empire and Emperor. He feared lest etern abould be taken against the general craedal which had been given and to obvious the danger of the spread of polygonious ideas. Hence he was not far from withdrawing from Luther the favour he had hitherto shown him, the more so new that the Court of Dreaden was intent on reasing trouble against als who had furthered the Landgrave's plan.

Meanwhile the saws rapidly spread, partly owing to privous balanging to the Court. It reached King Forwanded, and, by him, ^{*} Bristowniust dus Jones," ed. G. Hawernu, p. 307.

* Assount of the Marshal in "Philippe Besefwechsel," 1, p. 235.
* To Anthony von Schoolerg, in Rechwel, shall, p. 61, according to information takes from the neckeys.

Bookwell, for, e8., p. 63.

and still more by Morone, the Nuncio, it was carried to the Emperor.

Morone wrote on June 15, from the religious conference then proceeding at Hageanu, to Cardinal Farnese at Rome: "During the lifetime of his first wife, a doughter of Duke George of Saxony of good memory, the Landgrave of Hesse, has, as we hear, taken a second wife, a lady of distinction, von der Sale by name, a native of Saxony. It is east, his theologians teach that it is not forbidden to Christians to have several wives, except in the case of a Bishop, because there is no such prohibition in Holy Scriptime. I can hardly credit it, but since God has 'given there ever to a reprobate mind' [Rom. i. 28] and as the Kang has assured me that he has heard it from several quarters, I give you the report for what it is worth."

Philip of Hesse, who was already in disgrace with the Emperor on account of his expedition into Würtemberg and his support of Duke Ulrich, knew the penalties which he might expect unless he found some means of escape. The "Carolina" (1552) decreed "capital punishment" against bigamists, no less than against adulterers. The Landgrave himself was even fully prepared to forfeit one-third of his possessions should it be impossible to arrive otherwise at a settlement. He now openly declared—as he had already hinted he would—that, in case of necessity, he would make humble submission to the Emperor; if the worst came to the worst, then he would also make public the memorandum he had received from Wittenberg in order to exculpate himself—a threat which filled the Elector with alarm on account of his University and of Luther.

Bucer, the first to be summoned to the aid of the Hessian Court, advised the Landgrave to escape from his unfortunate predicament by downright lying. He wrote. If concealment and equivocation should prove of no avail, he was to state in writing that faise rumours concerning his person had come into circulation, and that no Christian was allowed to have two wives at the same time; he was also to replace the marriage-contract by another contract in Rockwell, foc. cit., p. 60.

Briefwechsel," 1, p. 177., cp. pp. 178, 180.

* He declared on Jan. 3, 15a1: "Thus much and not more the law may taka from us."

[&]quot;Nemmen in 'Corp ter. cw., Cod. Instra.," ed. Rruger, 1977, p. 198. Bucer pointed out to the Landgrave, that "according to the common law of the Empire such things were punished by death." "Philipps Briefwechsel," 1, p. 177, cp. pp. 178, 180.

which Margaret might be described as a concubine—such as God had allowed to His beloved friends—and not as a write within the meaning of the calamitous Imperial Law; an effort was also to be made to induce the Court of Dresden to keep silence, or to deny any knowledge of the business, and, in the meantime, the "lady" might be kept even more carefully seeluded than before.

The Landgrave's reply was violent in the extreme. He indignantly rejected Bucer's suggestion: the dissimulation alleged to have been practised by others, notably by the Patriarchs, Judges, Kings and Prophets, etc., in no wise proved the lawfulness of lying; Bucer had "been instigated to make such proposals by some worldly-wise persons and jurists whom we know well." Philip wrote to the same effect to the Lutheran theologians, Schnepl, Osmader and Brenz, who urged him to deny that Margaret was his lawful wife . "That, when once the matter has become quite public, we should assert that it was invalid, this we cannot bring ourselves to do. We cannot tell a lie, for to be does not become any man. And, moreover, God has forbidden lying. So long as it is possible we shall certainly reply " dubitative " or "per amphibologiam," but to say that it is invalid, such advice you may give to another, but not to us."8

The "amphibologia" had been advised by the Hessian theologians, who had pointed out that Margaret could best be described to the Imperial Court of Justice as a "concubina," since, in the language of the Old Testament, as also in that of the ancient Church, this word had sometimes been employed to describe a lawful wife. They also wrote to Luther and Melanchthon, fearing that they might desert the Landgrave, telling them that they were expected to stand by their memorandum. Although they were in favour of secrecy, yet they wished that, in case of necessity, the Wittenbergers should publicly admit their share. Good care would be taken to guard against the general introduction of polygamy.

On July 8, 1840, 684., p. 178 ff. Before this, on June 16, he had exherted the Landgrave to high up the matter as far as possible so that the whole church may not be "defied "by it. Ibid., p. 174, Paulus, fee. cit., p. 507.

* Thimpps Briefwecheel," 1, p. 185 f.

* Ibid., p. 183.

* Ibid., p. 341.

^{*} Analesta Lutheruna," ed. Kokie, p. 343 seg. Cp. Rockwell, far. cl., p. 71, n. 1.

Dispensation : Advice in Confession : a Confessor's Secret !

Was the document signed by Luther, Melanchthon and Bucer a dispensation for bigamy?

It has been so described. But, even according to the very wording of the memorandum, the signatones had no intention of issuing a dispensation. On the contrary, according to the text, they, as learned theologians, declared that the Divine Law, as they understood it, gave a general sanction, according to which, in cases such as that of Philip of Hesse, polygamy was allowed. It is true that they and Philip himself repeatedly use the word "dispensation," but by this they meant to describe the alleged general sanction in accordance with which the law admitted of exceptions in certain cases, hence their preference for the term "to use" the dispensation, instead of the more usual "to beg" or "to grant". Philip is firmly resolved "to use " the dispensation brought to his knowledge by Luther's writings, and the theologians, taking their cue from him. likewise speak of his " using " it in his own case.1

It was the same with the "dispensation" which the Wittenbergers proposed to Henry VIII of England. (See above, p. 4 f.) They had no wish to invest him with an authority which, according to their ideas, he did not possess, but they simply drew his attention to the freedom common to all, and declared by them to be bestowed by God, vis. in his case, of taking a second wife, telling him that he was free to have recourse to this dispensation. In other words, they gave him the power to dispense himself, regardless of ecclesisatical laws and authorities.

Another question: How far was the substance of the advice given in the Hessian case to be regarded as a secret? Can it really be spoken of as a " counsel given in confession," or as a " secret of the confessional "?

This question later became of importance in the negotiations which turned upon the memorandum. In order to answer it without prejudice it is essential in the first place to point out, that the subsequent interpretations and evasions must not here be taken into account. The actual wording of the document and its attendant historical circumstances have alone to be taken into consideration, abstraction being made of the fine distinctions and meanings afterwards read into it.

^{*} E. Friedberg remarks in the "Deutsche Zeitschn L KR.," 36, 1904, p. 441, that the Wittenbergers "did not even pusses any power of dispensing."

First, there is no doubt that both the Landgrave's request for the Wittenberg testimony and its granting were intended to be confidential and not public. Philip naturally assumed that the most punctilious secrecy would be preserved so long as no decision had been arrived at, seeing that he had made confidential disclosures concerning his immorality in pleading for a second marriage. Wittenbergers, as they explicitly state, gave their reply not merely unwillingly, with repugnance and with great apprehension of the scandal which might ensue, but also most urgently recommended Philip to keep the bigamy to himself. Both the request and the theological testimony accordingly came under the natural obligation of silence, i.e. under the so-called confidential scal of secrecy. This, however, was of course broken when the suppliant on his part allowed the matter to become public; in such a case no one could grudge the theologians the natural right of bringing forward everything that was required for their justification, even to the reasons which had determined them to give their consent, though of course they were in honour bound to show the utmost consideration: for this the petitioner himself was alone to blame.

As a matter of fact, however, strange though it may seem. Phihp's intention all along had been ultimately to make the marriage public. It cannot be proved that he ever made any written promise to observe the recommendation of absolute secrecy made by the theologians who drew up the memorandum disregarded his wish for publicity, and, on the contrary, "advised" that the matter should be kept a dead secret. Yet ought they not to have foreseen that a Prince so notoriously unscrupulous would be likely to disregard their "advice"? The theologians were certainly no men of the world if they really believed that the Landgrave's bigamy-and their memorandum by which it was justified-would or could remain concealed. They themselves had allowed a number of other parties to be initiated into the secret, nor was it difficult to foresee that Philip, and Margaret's ambitious mother, would not allow the stigma of concubrange to rest permanently on the newly wedded bride. The mother had expressly stipulated that Margaret should be treated as a lawful wife and given this title, and not as a concubine, though of this the Witten-bergers were not aware.

Further, the theological grounds for the Wittenberg "advice" must not be lost sight of in considering the question of the obligation of silence or secrecy. The theologisms based their decision on a doctrine which they had already openly proclaimed. Nor did Luther ever withdraw from the standpoint that polygamy was lawful; he even proclaimed it during the height of the controversy raised by the Hessian bigamy, though he was careful to restrict it. to very rare and exceptional cases and to make its use dependent on the consent of the authorities. Thus the grounds for the step he had taken in Philip's favour were universally and publicly known just as much as his other theological doctrines. If, however, his teaching on this matter was true, then, strictly speaking, people had as much right to it as to every other piece of truth; in fact, it was the more urgent that this Evangelical discovery should not be put under a bushel, seeing that it would have been a veritable godsend to many who grouned in the bonds of matrimony Hence everything, both on Philip's side and on that of the theologians, pointed to publicity. But may, perhaps, the Wittenberg "advice" have been esteemed a sort of "counsel given in Confession," and did its contents accordingly fall under the "secret of Con-Session " ?

The word "Confession," in its sacramental meaning, was never used in connection with the affair dealt with at Wittenberg, either in Philip's instructions to Bucer or in the theologians' memorandum, nor does it occur in any of the few documents relating to the bigamy until about six months later. "Confession" is first alleged in the letter of excuse given below which Luther addressed to the Elector of Saxony. It is true that the expression "in the way of Confession" occurs once in the memorandum, but there it is used in an entirely different sense and in no way stamps the business as a matter of Confession. There it is stated (above, p. 21), that those who were to be apprised of the bigamy were to learn it "in the way of Confession."

Here the word Confession is employed by metonymy and merely emphasises the need of discretion. Here there was naturally no idea of the sacramental scal, or of the making of a real Confession. In the Middle Ages the term Confession was not seldom used to denote the imparting of an ordinary confidential secret, just as the word to confess originally meant to admit, to acknowledge, or to communicate something secret. This, however, was not the meaning attached to it by those who sought to shelter themselves behind the term in the controversies which ensued after the bigamy had become generally known. To vindicate the keeping secret of his so-called "advice in Confession," Luther falls back upon his Catholic recollections of the entire secrecy required of the Confessor, in other words, on the sacramental "seal."

Undoubtedly the Seal of Confession is inexorable; according to the Catholic view it possesses a sacramental sanction and surrounds, like a protecting rampart, the sanctuary of the Sacrament of Penance, which otherwise would be shunned by all. But this absolute and sacramental obligation of silence attends only the administration of the Sacrament of Penance.

The idea that Luther and his comrades when signing the " advice" were dispensing the Sacrament of Penance cannot but raise a smile. In connection with this matter non-Catholic theologians and historians would never have spoken as they have done of Luther as a Confessor, had they been better acquainted with the usages of the older Church. In the case of such writers all that is known of the system of Confession is often a few distorted quotations from casusts. Even under its altered form, as then in use among the Protestants, Confession could only mean an admission of one's sins, made to obtain absolution. In Lutheranism, confession, so far as it was retained at all, meant the awakening and animating of faith by means of some sort of selfaccusation completed by the assurance given by the preacher of the Divine promise and forgiveness, a process which bears no analogy to the "testimony" given by the theologians to Philip of Hesse. In the Catholic Church, moreover, in whose practice Luther seems anxious to take refuge, Confession involves an accusation of all grievous sins, contrition, a firm resolve to amend, satisfaction and absolution. What was there of all this in the Landgrave's so-called Confession 14. Where was the authority to absolve, even had this been what the Landgrave sought? How then could there come into play the Scal of Confession, i.e. any sacramental obligation apart from the purely natural obligation of keeping silence concerning a communication made in confidence ? Again, Confession, even according to Lutheran ideas, is not made at a distance, or to several persons simultaneously, or with the object of accuring a signed document.

Apart from all this one may even question whether the Landgrave's disclosures were really honestly meant. Not everyone would have taken them from the outset as intended semously, or have regarded them as above suspicion. Melanchthon, for instance, soon began to have doubts. (See below.) The readiness, may, engerness, shown by Philip later to repeat his Confession to others, to reinforce it by even more appalling admissions of wickedness, and to give it the fullest publicity, is really not favourable to the "Confession" idea; on the contrary, it reminds us of the morbid pleasure which persons habituated to vice and who have lost all respect whether for themselves or for the virtue of others, take in speaking openly of their moral lapses. The most important point to hear in mind is, however, the fact, that with Philip of Hesse it was a question of a marriage which he intended should be kept secret only for a time. and further that the Wittenbergers were aware of Philip's readiness to lay his case before the Emperor, nay, even the Pone should necessity arise. Owing to this they could not be blind to the possibility of the marriage, and, incidentally, of the Landgrave's admission of moral necessity, and further of their own "advice" being all disclosed. Thus the "Seal of Confession" was threatened from the very first. Philip himself never recognised a binding obligation of secreey on the part of the Wittenbergers; on the contrary, his invitation to them was: Speak out freely, now that the step has been taken with your sanction! What was Luther's answer? He appealed to the Secret of the Confessional and refused to defend the act before the world and the Empire, but merely "before God"; all he was willing to do was to vindicate it "before God, by examples such as that of Abraham, etc., and to conceal it as much as possible." And yet, to forestall what will be related below, full publicity would surely have been the best thing for himself, as then the world would at least have learnt that he was not desirous of introducing polygamy generally, and that the whole business had only been made common property through Philip's disregard of the recommendation of secrecy. Instead of this, however, he preferred to profess his readiness (it was probably no more than a threat) to admit publicly that he had been in the wrong all along and had acted foolishly; here again, had he been true to his word, the "Secret of the Confessional" would assuredly have fared badly.

Cp. N. Paulus, "Das Beichtgeheimnts und die Deppelehe Philippe usw.," "Hist.-pol. B.," 135, 1995, p. 317 ff.
 Cp. Rockwell, foc. cit., pp. 154, 156.

Even in his letter of excuse to the Elector Johann Frederick concerning his sanction of the higamy, Luther explained so much of the incident, that the "Seal of Confession" was practically violated; quite unmindful of the inviolability of the Seal he here declared, that he would have preferred to say nothing of the "counsel given in Confession had not necessity" forced him to do so. But what kind of Seal of Confession was this, we may ask, which could thus be set aside in case of necessity?

Melanchthon acted differently. He, without any necessity, at once recounted everything that had happened to a friend in a letter eloquent with grief. He, the author of the "Counsel of Confession," felt under no obligation to regard the Seal. He considers himself liberated, by Philip's behaviour, from the obligation even of confidential secrecy. Bucer expressed himself on Aug. 8, 1540, in a similar fashion concerning the counsel given to the Landgrave "in Confession": Luther would certainly publish and defend it, should the "marriage have to be admitted" through no fault of the Landgrave's. No one, in fact, displayed the slightest scruple regarding the secrecy of the Confession—except Luther and those who re-echo his centiments.

Google

Yet in a later missive to Philip of Rems (Sep. 17, 1540) he too speaks of the "counsel given in Confession in case of processity" Here, however, he bases has injunction of science un other considerations.
* "Philipps Briefwechsel," 1, p. 208.

According to the above we are justified in saying that the term "Counsel given in Confession" is in no wise descriptive of the Wittenberg document. The word "testimony," or " certificate," used both in Philip's instructions and in an important passage of the document signed by Luther, Melanchthon and Bucer, is historically more correct; the terms "opinion" or "memorandum" are equally applicable.

The Wittenbergers gave their testimony or opinion—such is the upshot of the matter-but no Dispensation or Counsel in Confession in the sense just determined. They gave a testimony, which was asked for that it might be made public, but which was given in confidence, which was moreover based on their openly expressed teaching, though it actually dealt only with Philip's own case, a testimony which no longer involved them in any obligation of scorecy once the marriage had been made public by Philip, and once the latter had declared his intention of making the testimony public should circumstances demand it.

Luther's Embarrassment on the Bigamy becoming Public.

At the commencement of June, 1540, Luther was in great distress on account of the Hessian bigamy. His embarrassment and excitement increased as the tidings flew far and wide, particularly when the Court of Dresden and his own Elector began to take fright at the scandal, and the danger of complications arising with the Emperor. On the other hand. Luther was not unaware of the Landgrave's doubts as to whether he would stand by his written declaration. Jonas wrote from Wittenberg on June 10 to George of Anhalt: " Philip is much upset and Dr. Martin full of thought,"1

On that very day Bruck, the Electoral Chancellor, discussed the matter with both of them at Wittenberg. He acquainted them with his sovereign's fears. They had gone too far, and the publication of the affair had had the most disastrous results: a young Princess and Landgravine had appeared on the scene, which was not at all what the Elector had expected; the Court of Dresden was loud in its complaints and spared not even the Elector: the Dresden people were bringing forward against Luther what he had taught in favour of polygamy thirteen years before; the door had now been opened wide to polygamists.

¹ "Briefwecheel des Jones," 1, p. 394.

Not long after Luther wrote, that, were it necessary, he would know how to "extricate himself." Even before dropping this curious remark he had shown himself very anxious to make his position secure. It was with this object in view, that, after his interview with Brück, probably on the same day, he proceeded to explain the case to his sovereign in the lengthy letter? in which he appeals to Confession and its scereey.

"Before the world and against the laws of the Empire at cannot be defended," but "we were desirous of glossing at over before God as much as possible with examples, such as that of Abraham, etc. All this was done and treated of as in Confession, so that we cannot be charged as though we had done it willingly and gladly, or with joy and pleasure. . . . I took into consideration the unavoidable necessity and weakness, and the danger to his conscience which Master Bucer had set forth."

Luther goes on to complain, that the Landgrave, by allowing this "matter of Confession" and "advice gives in Confession." to become to a certain extent public, had caused all this "annoyance and contumely," He relates in detail what Bucer, when seeking to obtain the Wittenberg sanction, had recounted concetning his master's immorality, so contrary to the Evangel, " though he should be one of the mainstays of the party." They had at first looked askance at the idea, but, on being told that " he was unable to reanquish it, and, should we not permit it, would do it in spite of us, and obtain permission from the Emperor or the Pope unless we were beforehand, we humbly bogged His Screne highness, if he was really set on it, and, as he declared, could not in conscience and before God do otherwise, that he would at least keep it secret." This had been promised them [by Bucer]; their intention had been to "save his conecience as best we might."

Luther, far from showing himself remonseful for his indulgence, undeavours in his usual way to suppress any scruples of conscience: "Even to-day, were such a case to come before me again, I should not know how to give any other advice than what I then gave, nor would it trouble me should it afterwards become known." "I am not ashamed of the testimony even should it come before the world, though, to be spared trouble, I should prefer it to be kept secret so long as possible." Still, no angul would have induced him to give such advice "had be known that the Landgrave had long entieted and could still satisfy his cravings on others, for instance, as I now learn, on lady von Earweg." This indy was perhaps a relative of Rudolf Schools, Landvogt of Eachwage on the Werra. We may recall, that the proposal of taking a "concubuse" in place of the too numerous "light women." had been made to Philip by his mater."

1 " Briefwechsel," 13, p. 79.

¹ Ed. by Seidemann, "Lauterbachs Tagebuch," p. 196 ff., with the notice, "Written in April or June, 1540." Reckwell gives the date more correctly, as, probably, June 10 (pp. 138, 384).

Luther gone on to excuse his conduct still further to the Elector: "btill less would I have advised a public marriage"; that the around wife was to become a Princess or Landgravine—a plan at which the whose Empire would take offence—had been kept from him altogether; "what I expected was, that, more he was obliged owing to the weakness of the firsh to follow the ordinary course of an and shains, he would perhaps keep an honest girl in arms house, and wed her accret y—though even this would look ill in the eight of the world—and thus overcome has great trouble of conscionce, he could then ride backwards and forwards, as the great lords do frequently enough, nimilar advice I gave also to certain parish private under Duke George and the bishops, viz. that they should marry their cook accretly."

Though what he here anys may be worthy of credence, yet to apply the term Confession to what passed between Philip and Wittenberg is surely to introduce an alien element into the affair. Let be does use the word three times in the course of the letter and assumingly lays great stress on it. The Confession, he mys, covered all that had passed, and, because it "was seemly" to "keep matters treased of in Confession private" he find Melanchthon "preferred not to relate the matter and the counsel

" Philippe ferefavehed" I, p. 160. The Landgrave in Bucer. He was to tell his source "that she must surely excellent having told him that he should here a concutance statead of having recourse to immerous prostitutes; if she was willing to allow what was contrary to Unit a law, why not allow that, which is a dispersantion of God?"

Op. " Briefweched," 13, p. 82, n. 4, the remark of G. Kawerou. "The regret felt by Luther was saused by the knowledge that the Landgrave had already a "concubere of his own" and had not here entirifying his firsts morely on common prestructed , had he known this at the time he gave his advice he would certainly have consented the Landgrave to contract a nest of spiritual marriage with this concuhim." Acatha had seen a difficulty in Luther's later statement, that he would not have given his counsel (the advice tendered did not specify the lady) had be howen that the Landgrare had "hong satisfied, and rould still satisfy, his maying on others, 'etc. That there is really a deficulty annulved, at least in Lather's use of the placed "others, second clear unless, indeed, Rawersy would make Lather source. the Landgrave to contract "operation marriage" with all three several littles. Einewhere Litther doscerbes as a " harlot " a certain Catharine whom Kawerau (shad) surmous to have been this more Linking. By her Philip had a daughter named Ureda whom, in 1504, he gave in marriage to Claus Ferber, given in Confession " to the Elector; but, since the Landgrave had revealed the substance of the Confession and the advice, it was easier for him to speak. Hence he would now reveal the "advice given in Confession; though I should much have preferred to keep it secret, unless necessity had forced it from me, now I am unable to do so." The fact is, however, that the real Beal of Confession (and of this Luther was quite aware) does not allow the confessor who has received the Confession to make any communication or disclosure concerning it; even should the penitent make statements concerning other matters which occurred in the Confession, under no circumstances whatsoever, however serious these may be, not even in the case of danger to life and limb, may "necessity" "force out" anything. Although in this case Luther had not heard a Confession at all, yet he refers to the Secret of the Confessional with which he was acquainted from his Catholic days, and his own former exercise of it: "I have received in Confession many confidences, both in Popery and since, and given advice, but were there any question of making them public I should be obliged to say no . . . Such matters are no business of the secular courts nor ought they to be made public."

This uncalled for introduction of Confession was intended to save him from being obliged to admit his consent publicly; it was meant to reassure so weak a theologian as the Elector, who dreaded the scandal arising from Luther's advice to commit bigamy, and the discussion of the case before the Imperial Court of Justice; possibly he also hoped it would serve against that other princely theologian, viz. the Landgrave, and cause him to withdraw his demand for a public acknowledgment of the sanction given. His tactics here remind us of Luther's later demail, when he professed himself ready simply to deny the bigamy and his share in it—because everything had been merely a matter of Confession.

Even in this first letter dealing with the question, he is clearly on the look-out for a loophole by which he may escape from the calamitous business.

The publication of the "testimony" was to be prevented at all costs. But, as a matter of fact, not only did the "Seal of Confession" present no obstacle, but even the common secrecy referred to above (p. 81) was no longer binding. This had been cancelled by the indiscretion of the Landgrave. Moreover, apart from this, the natural obligation of secrecy did not extend to certain extreme cases which might have been foreseen by both parties and in the event of which both would recover their freedom. It should be noted, that Luther hardly made any appeal to this natural obligation of secreey, probably because it could not be turned to account so easily. The Scal of Confession promised to serve him better in circles so little acquainted with theology.

In the second letter dealing with the bigamy, dated June 27, 1540, and addressed to Philip's intimate, Eberhard von der Thann, Luther speaks with an eye on Hesse.1 Thann, through Chancellor Brück, had informed him of what was being said of him there, and had asked what Luther would advise the Hessian Prince, and whether, in order to obviate other cases of polygamy in Hesse, it would be advisable for the authorities to issue an edict against the universal lawfulness of having several wives. replied, that he agreed with the Landgrave's intention as announced by Thann concerning his second marriage, viz. to wait until the Emperor "should approach His Screne Highness on the subject"; and then to write to the Emperor: "That he had taken a concubine but that he would be perfectly ready to put her away again if other Princes and Lords would set a good example." If the Emperor were compelled "to regard the 'lady' as a concubine," "no one else would dare to speak or think differently "; in this wise the real state of things would be "covered over and kept secret." On the other hand, it would not be at all advisable to issue any edict, or to speak of the matter," for then "there would be no end or limit to gossip and suspicions,"

"And I for my part am determined [here he comes to his "testimony" and the meaning he now put on it] to keep alence concerning my part of the confession which I heard from His Secone Highness through Bucer, even should I suffer for it, for it is better that people should say that Dr. Martin acted foolishly in his concession to the Landgrave—for even great men have acted foolishly and do so, even now, as the saying goes: A wise man makes no small nustakes—rather than reveal the reasons why we secretly consented; for that would greatly disgrace and damage the reputation of the Landgrave, and would also make matters worse." To the Elector his sovereign Linter had said that, even to-day, he "would not be able to give any different advice" and that he saw no reason to blush for it. Hence it is hard to believe that he seriously contemplated admitting that he had been guilty of an act of "folly" and had "acted foolishly." It will be shown more clearly below what his object was in threatening such a repudiation of his advice to the Landgrave.

⁸ Luthers Briefe," ed. De Wotte, 6. p. 267 f., and, better, in Rockwell, p. 165, after the original.

In his letter to Thana, Luther decides in favour of the expedient suggested by the Hessian theologisms, vis. of the amphibological use of the word concubine; here it should, however, be noted, that this term, if used officially to counteract the common report concerning the new marriage, plainly implied a denial of the reality of the bigsmy.

But how if the Landgrave were directly confronted in a Court of Justice with the question; Have you, or have you not, married two wives ?

Here belongs the third letter of Luther's which we have on the subject and which was despatched to Heise before the middle of July. It is addressed to "a Hessian Councillor" who has been identified, with some probability, as the Hessian Chancellor Johann Feige.¹

To the addressee, who was acquainted with the whole matter and had applied to Luther for his opinion on behalf of the Landgrave, the writer defines his own position still more clearly; if people say openly that the Landgrave has contracted a second marriage, all one need answer is, that this is not true, a though it is true that he has contracted a secret union; hence he himself was wont to say, "the Landgrave's other marriage is all nonsense."

The justification of this he finds in the theory of the secrecy of confession upon which he insists strongly in this letter. Not only is his own share in the matter nul because estensibly done in confession, but the marriage itself is merely a sort of "confession marriage," a thing concealed and therefore non-existent no far as the world is concerned. "A secret affirmative cannot become a public affirmative... a secret "yes" remains a public "no" and vice versa.... On this I take my stand; I say that the Landgrave's second marriage is nul and cannot be convincing to anyone. For, as they say, "palam," it is not true, and although it may be true "clam," yet that they may not tell."

He is very bitter about the Landgravo's purpose of making the marriage and the Wittenberg "advice" public, should need arise. The fate of the latter was, in fact, his chief anxiety. "In this the Landgrave touches us too near y, but hiswelf even more, that he is determined to do 'palam' what we arranged with him 'dam,' and to make of a nullum' as 'omne'; this we are unable either to defend or to answer for, and we should certainly come to high words." The last sentence was, however, felt by Luther to be too strong and he accordingly struck at out of the letter.

Briefe," 6, p. 203 seq. For the address see Rockwell, vini., p. 166, where the date is fixed between July 7 and 15, 1540.

He also says that the Landgrave's appeal to his sermon on Genesis would be of no avail, because he (Luther) had taught, both provious to and after it, that the law of Moire was not to be introduced, though some of it "might be used secretly in cases of queenity, or even publicly by order of the authorities." But advice extorted from him in Confession by the distress of a suffering conseience could "not be held to constitute a true precedent in law." He here touches upon a thought to which he was to return in entirely different circumstances: Neither the prenchers, nor the Gaspel, lay down outward laws, not even concerning religion; the occular authorities are the only legis. lators, ecclesisatical guidance comprises only advice, direction and the expounding of Scripture, and has to do only with the interior bia, being without any juradiction, even spiritual; as public men, the pasture were appointed to preach, pray and give advice; to the individual they rendered service amidst the " secret needs of conscience."1

He thereby absolves himself from the consequence apparently involved in the step he had taken, vis. the introduction of polygamy as a "general right"; it does not follow that: "What you do from necessity, I have a right to do "; " necessity knows no law or precedent," hence a right to do "; " necessity knows no law or precedent," hence a right to do "; " necessity what thus hooks in cases of necessity cannot be taken as a law or rule. On the other hand, Luther will not listen to the proposal then being made in Hosse, vis. that, in order to counteract the bud example, a special edict should be sessed decisting polygamy unlawful as a general rule, but allowable in an exceptional case, on the strength "of secret advice given in Confession"; on the contrary, it would be far better simply to denounce polygamy as uplauful.

Hence if the Landgrave, so Luther concludes, "will not forsake the sweetheart" on whom "he has so set his heart that she has become a need to him," and if, moreover, he will "keep her out of the way," then "we theologians and confessors shall vindicate it before God, as a case of necessity to be exemples of Genesis. But defend it before the world and "rure name regente," that we cannot and shall not do. Short of the the Landgrave may count upon our best service."

The Landgrave was, however, not satisfied with either of these letters, both of which came into his hands. He wanted from Luther a clear and public admission of his share in the business, which, to the Prince's peril, had now become as good as public, and threatened to constitute a precedent. By this invitation the Prince naturally released Luther from all obligation of secrecy. Even the making public of the immorality, which had served as a pretext for the new marriage, he did not mind in the least, for his laxity in morals was already a matter of common knowledge; he discussed his lapses with the theologians as openly as though all of them had been his confessors and spiritual directors; he was also quite ready to repeat his admissions, "as in Confession," before secular witnesses. Such was the depth of depravity into which his passions had brought him.

¹ Cp. vol. ni., p. 20 ff.

Yielding to pressure brought to bear on him by Saxony, Luther had meanwhile conceived the idea of publishing a work against polygamy. The new expedient had indeed been foreshadowed in his last letter. On June 17, 1540, Jonas wrote to George of Anhalt that Luther might be expected to write a work "Contra polygamiam." Martin Heyer of Schaffhausen, on his return from Wittenberg, also brought the news, so Bullinger was informed, that "Luther was being compelled by the Hessian business to write a work against the plurality of wives."

The project was, however, never realised, probably on account of the insuperable difficulties it involved.

But though this work never saw the light, history has preserved for us a number of Luther's familiar conversations, dating from this period and taken down directly from his lips, utterances which have every claim to consideration and faithfully mirror his thoughts.

Luther's Private Utterances Regarding the Bigamy.

The Table-Talk, dating from the height of the hubbub caused by the bigamy, affords us a vivid psychological picture of Luther.

Of this Table-Talk we have the detailed and authentic notes from the pen of Johann Mathesius, who was present. These notes, in their best form, became known only in 1908, ^{1 &}quot;Briefwechsel det Jones," 1, p. 397 f.

Thus Gualther from Franklovt Sep. 15, 1540 to Bullinger, in Fusain, " Epistola," p. 205. Ronkwell, ibid., p. 176.

44 LUTHER THE REFORMER

thanks to Kroker's edition, but, for the better understanding of Luther's personality, his intimate descriptions of what was passing in his mind are of inestimable value. Conjointly with the principal passage, which prohably dates from June 18, 1540, other sayings dropped regarding the same matter may be considered.³

The scene in the main was as follows: The usual guests, among them the disciples with their note-books, were assembled after the evening most in Luther's house, grouped around the master, who seemed suck in thought, Melancistons, however, was missing, for he by seriously ill at Weimar, overwhelmed by arrively new that his consent to the bigarry was leaking out. Whilst yet at table two letters were handed to Luther, the first from Bruck, the Electoral Chanceller, the second from the Elector himself. Both referred to Melanchthon. The Flactor requested Luther to betake himself as soon as possible to Weimar to his friend, who seemed in danger of death, and informed him at the same time of the measures threstened by the Landgrave in the matter of the second marriage.

Luther, after glancing at Bruck's missive concerning Melanchthon, said to the guesta: "Philip is pining away for veration, and has failen into a fever ("Arrisons"). But why does the good fellow crucify himself no about this bissiness? All his anxiety will do no good. I do wish I were with him? I know how sensitive he is. The scandar pains him beyond measure—I, on the other hand, have a timek skim, I am a persont, a hard Saxon when such a are concerned." I expect I shall be sutimored to Philip."

Someone thersupon intersected the remark: "Doctor, perhaps the Codoquium [which was to be hid at Hagenen] will not now take place"; Lather replied: "They will certainly have to wait for us...."

A second messenger now came in with the Elector's letter, conveying the expected summons to proceed to Weimar. On the reader the news it contained concerning the Landgrave fell-like the blows of a sledge-hammer. After attentively perusing the letter " with an earnest mien," he said: "Philip the Landgrave is cracked, he is now asking the Emperor to let him keep both wives."

The allusion to the Landgrave's mental state is explained by a former statement of Lather's nade in connection with some words attered by the Landgrave a father. The old Landgrave

The chief passage will be found in Kruker (Mathesian, "Teach eviden," p. 156 f.) more correctly than in Locache (Mathesian, Anfanch nungen," p. 117 ff.). It is headed "De Mucedonien negatio," because in Lather's circle Philip of Hesis was known as the "Macedonian." Where no other reference is given our quotations are taken from this passage.

On the sign, see present work, vot. m., p. 231

(William II) med to say to he son Philip: "If you take after your mother, then you won t come to much; if you take after me, you will have nothing about you that I can proce; if you take after both of us, then you will be a real demon." Lather had added. "I fear he is also mad, for it runs in the family "! "And Philip [Meisrchthon] and: That [the bigumy, is the beginning of his incomity. **

When Luther re-entered, so the narrator continues, "he was as cheerful as excluding, and he said to use: "It is ground having something to do, for then we get siess, otherwise we do nothing but feed and smil. How our Papeate will scream ! But let them how to their own destruction. Our course is a good one and up fault is to be found with our way of life, or rather the corrects harmeelf; with the fife of three who take it aericanty. If the Housan Landgrave has mined, then that is ain and a scandal, That we have frequently discounseled by good and hely arivice; they have seen our innecesses and yet refuse to see it. Hence they [the Papers) are now forced to look the Hessian " in snum " ? (i.e. mre witnesses of his shame). But they will be brought to destruction by jour wandals because they refuse to heres to the pare doctrine, for God will not on this acrount formula us or His Word, or spare them, even though we have our share of ain, for He has resolved to overthrow the Papers. That has been decreed by God, so we read in Daniel, where it is foretold of him [Antishrut] who is even now at the door : " And none shall help him " (Dam. 24, 45). In former times no power was able to met out the Pope ; in our own day no one will be able to help him, because Antichrist in revealed."

Thus amount the trouble sooming he finds his chief considered in his institute will permission that the Papary must fall and that he is the chosen instrument to bring this about, i.e. in his supposed mission to thwart Aztichnet, a Divine mission which could not be contravened. Hence his pseudo-mysticism was once again made to nerve his purpose.

"He soundain occur amongst us," he continues, "let us not forget that they caused in Christ's own circle. The Pharisees were doubtless in glee over our Lord Christ on account of the wickedness of Judas. In the same way the Landgrave has become a Judas to us. 'Ah, the new prophet has such followers [as Judas, erred the fore of Christ!] What good can come of Christ! Hut because they refused to open their eyes to the turracies, they were forced to see 'Christies Crucificus' and ... later to see and miffer under Titus. But mer one may obtain parties and be easily seriedled, it is only incremely that the Emperor should forbid (the bigamy), or that our Princes should intercede (for the Heman), which they are at liberty to do, or that he should repudiate the step he took."

* Matherius, "Tischreden," p. 143.

Philip's father and his uncle William I (the elder brother) died innane. (See below, p. 61.)

^{*} On the Marcol in legend (again to be mentioned on the next parciep, vol. iii., p. 268, n. 4; F. H. von der Hagen, "Narrenbuch," Halle, 1611, p. 256 ff., and Recker ii, pp. 166 and 162, where other metances are given of Luthor's use of the same figure.

"David also fell, and surely there were greater scandals under Moses in the wilderness. Moses caused his own masters to be slain. . . . But God had determined to drive out the heathen, hence the scandals amongst the Jews availed not to prevent it. Thus, too, our sine are pardonable, but not those of the Papiets , for they are contemners of God, crucify Christ and, though they know better, defend their blasphemies."

"What advantage de they expect of it," he goes on to sek in an fromcal vera; "they put men to death, but we work for life and take many wives." This he said, according to the notes, " with a joyful countenance and amidst loud laughter."1 "God has resolved to vex the people, and, when my turn comes, I will give them hard words and tell them to look Marcolfus 'in snum' since they refuse to look him in the face." He then went on : "I don't see why I should trouble myself about the matter. I shall commend it to our God. Should the Macedonian [the Landgrave, desort us, Christ will stand by us, the blessed Schevlimin: (ליסדי: Sit at my right hand (Ps. ciz. 1)]. He has surely brought us out of even tighter places. The rest tution of Wurtemberg puts this scandal into the shade, and the Sacramentanana and the revolt (of the Pessants); and yet God delivered in out of all that." What he means to say as Even greater scandal was given by Phil p of Hesse when he imposed on Wortemberg the Protestant Duke Linch, heedicas of the rights of King Ferdinand and of the opposition of the Emperor and the Church .1 in the same way the ever-recurring dissensions on the Sacrament were an even greater scandal, and so was the late Peasant War which threatened worse things to the Evangelical cause than the Hessian affair.

"Should the Landgrave fall away from us."—This fear lest Philip should desert their party Luther had expressed in some rather earlier utterances in 1540, when he had described more particularly the Landgrave's character and attitude. "A strange man!" he says of him. "He was born under a star. He is bent upon having his own way, and so fancies he will obtain the approval of Emperor and Pope. It may be that he will fall away from us on account of this affair. . . He is a real Hessian; he cannot be still nor does he know how to yield. When once this business is over he will be hatching something else. But perhaps death will earry him, or her (Margaret), off before." A Hessian Councillor who was present quite bore out what Luther had said: Nothing was of any avail with the Landgrave, "what he once undertakes be cannot be induced to give up." In proof of this those present instanced the violence and utter injustice of the raid made on Würternberg. "Because he is such a strange character," Luther remarked, "I must let it pass. The Emperor, moreover, will certainly not let him have his way "! "No sensible man would have undertaken that campaign, but he, carried away by fury, managed it quite well. Only wait a little i It [the new scandal] will pass!" Luther was also ready to acknowledge that the Landgrave, in spite of the promises and offers of the Emperor and Duke of Saxony, had remained so far "very faithful" to the Evangel."

^{3 &}quot; " I per tamen accident homines (heretics) non laboramus pro esta et discimus plures uzores." Histo loctimimo vultu dizit, non sine magno risu "

Cp. abid., p. 139.

In the conversation on June 18, Luther adopts a forcedly light waw of the matter: "It is only a three-months' affair, then the whole thing will finals out. Would to God Philip would look at it in this light instead of graving so over it! The Papiets are now Demons and I Mitio"; with these words commences a string of word-for-word quotations from Terence's play! Adelphi," all concerning the hamb and violent Demons, whom Luther takes as a figure of the Catholic Church, and the mild and peaceshle Mitio, in whom Luther sees himself. In the Notes the sentences are given almost unaltered: "The prostitute and the matron living in one house." "A son is born." "Margaret has no dowry." "I, Mitio, say; "May the gods direct all for the best!" "Man's life is like a throw of the dice."

"I overlook much worse things than this," he continues. "If anyone says to me. Are you pleased with what has taken place? I reply: No. oh, would that I could alter it. Since I cannot, I am resolved to bear it with equantimity. I commit it all to our deer God. Let Him preserve His Church as it now stands in order that it may remain in the unity of faith and doctrine and the pure confession of the Word, all I hope for in that it may never grow worse?"

"On roung from the table he said cheerfully: I will not give the devil and the Papists the satisfaction of thinking that I am troubled about the matter. God will see to it. To Him we commend the whole."

In thus shifting the responsibility from his own shoulders and putting it on God - Whose chosen instrument, even at the most entical juncture, he would still persuade himself he was—he finds the most convenient ascape from anxiety and difficulty. It has all been laid upon us by God. "We must put up with the devil and his fifth as long as we Live." Therefore, forward against the Papiets, who seek to conceal their "sodomitic vices." behind this biguing. "We may not and shall not yield. Let them do their dirty work and let us lay odds on." With these words he is again quite himself. He is again the inspired prophet, oblivious of all save his messon to champion God's cause; all his difficulties have vanished and even his worst more, faults have disappeared. But in this frame of mind Luther was not always able to persovere.

Ibid., p. 133. He speaks in the same way of the Emperor on p. 140.
 Ibid., p. 139. May 21 to June 11, 1640.

For the quotations from Terence, see Rockwell, p. 154. Cp. Mroker, ibid., p. 158.

"All I hope for is that it may never grow worse." The deprincing thought implied in these words largered in the depths of his soul in spite of all his forced merriment and bravado. "Ales, my God, what have we not to put up with from families and ecandals! One follows on the heels of the other, when this (the bigniny) has been adjusted, then it is certain that something else will apring up, and many new sects will also arise. . . . But God will preserve His Christendom."

Melanchthon consoled him. Soon after the arrival of the letters mentioned above Luther set out for Weimar. His attentions to the sick man, and particularly his words of encouragement, succeeded, so to say, in recalling him to life. Luther speaks of it in his letters at that time as a "manifest miracle of God," which puts our unbelief to shame. The functful embellishment which he gave to the incident when narrating it, making it into a sort of miracle, has left its traces in his friend Ratzeberger's account.

Confident as Luther's language here seems, when it is a question of infusing new courage into himself, still he admits plainly enough one point, concerning which he has not a word to say in his correspondence with strangers or in his public utterances: A sin, over and above all his previous enimes, now weighed upon the Hessian and his party owing to what had taken place. He repeatedly uses the words "sin," "scandal," "offence" when speaking of the bigamy; he feels the need of seeking consolation in the "unpardonable" sins of the Cathorics for the moral failings of his own party, which, after all, would be remitted by God. Nor Ibut., p. 138.

 To Johnna Lang, July 2, 1840, "Briefe," 4, p. 298; "miracula Dei manifesta vivit."

Ratacherger, p. 101 f. Cp. present work, vol. ii., p. 162.

Mathenus, "Tischroden," p. 153.

does the Landgrave's sin consist in his carelessness about keeping the matter secret. Luther compares his sin to David's, whose adultery had been forgiven by God, and reckons Philip's new sin amongst the sins of his co-religionists, who, for all their failings, were destined, with God's help, to overthrow the Papal Antichrist. "Would that I could after it !" Such an admission he would not at any price make before the princely Courts concerned, or before the world. Still less would be have admitted publicly, that they were obliged " to put up with the devil's fifth." It is therefore quite correct when Köstlin, in his Biography of Luther, points out, speaking of the Table-Talk: "That there had been sin and scandal, his words by no means deny." Concerning the whole affair Köstlin moreover remarks: "Philip's bigamy is the greatest blot on the history of the Reformation, and remains a blot in Luther's life in spite of everything that can be alleged in explanation. or excuse."18

F. W. Hassencamp, another Protestant, says in his " Hessische Kirchengeschichte " . " His statements at that time concerning his share in the Landgrave's bigamy prove that, mentally, he was on the verge of despair. Low pleasantry and vulgarity are mixed up with threats and words of prayer." "Nowhere does the great Reformer appear so small as here."4-In the "Historisch-politische Blätter," in 1846, K. E. Jareke wrote of the Table-Talk concerning the bigamy: "Rarely has any man, however coarse-minded, however blinded by hate and hardened by years of combat against his own conscience, expressed himself more hideously or with greater vulgarity."4

"After so repeatedly describing himself as the prophet of the Germans," says A. Hausrath, " he ought not to have had the weakness to seek a compromise between morality and policy, but, like the preacher robed in camels' hair, he should have boldly told the Hessian Princelet: It is not lawful for you to have her." Hausrath, in 1904, is voicing the opinion of many earlier Protestant historians when he regrets "that, owing to wearness and pressure from without," Luther "sanctioned an exception to God's unconditional command." "The band of Protestant leaders, once so valuant and upright," so he says, "had for once been caught sleeping. Evening was approaching and the day was drawing in, and the Lord their God had left them."!

Vol. zviii., p. 461.

^{*} Köstlin-Kawersu, 2, p. 526. * Ibid., p. 476. * Thus Hassencamp, vol. i., p. 507, though he was using the earlier editions of the Table-Talk, which are somewhat more circumspect.

Luther at the Conference of Eisenach. The Landgrave's Indignation.

An official conference of theologians and Councillors from Hesse and the Electorate of Saxony met at Eisenach at the instance of Philip on July 15, 1540, in order to deliberate on the best means of escaping the legal difficulty and of satisfying Philip's demand, that the theologians should give him their open support. Luther, too, put in an appearance and lost no time in entering into the debate with his wonted bluster.

According to one account, on their first arrival, he bitterly reproached ("accrbissimis verbis") the Hessian theologians. The report of the Landgrave's sister says, that his long talk with Philip's Chancellor so affected the latter that the "tears streamed down his checks," particularly when Luther rounded on the Hessian Court officials for their too great inclination towards polygamy. Though these reports of the effect of his strictures and exhortations may be exaggerated, no less than the remark of Jonas, who says, that the "Hessians went home from Eisenach with long faces," still it is quite likely that Luther made a great in pression on many by his behaviour, particularly by the energy with which he now stood up for the cause of monogamy and appealed to the New Testament on its behalf.

Without denying the possibility of an exception in certain rare cases, he now mainted very strongly on the general prohibition.

The instructions given to the Hessians showed him plainly that the Landgrave was determined not to conceal his bigamy any longer, or to have it branded as mere concubinage; the theologians, so the document declares, would surely never have advised him to have recourse to sinful concubinage. That he was not married to his second wife was a lie, which he would not consent to tell were he to be asked point-blank; his bigamy was really a dispensation " permitted by God, admitted by the learned, and consented to by his wife." If "hard pressed" he must disclose it. To introduce polygamy generally was of course quite a different matter, and was not to be thought of. - Needless to say. Luther was ready enough to back up this last stipulation, for his own sake as much as for the Landgrave's.

¹ Luthers Leben, ⁹ 2, 1004, p. 403 f.

Sualther, in Rockwell, toid, p. 186, n. 1. 1 Ibid. 4 Ibid.

During the first session of the conference, held in the Rathaus at Eisenach, Luther formally and publicly committed himself to the expedient at which he had faintly hinted even previously. He unreservedly proposed the telling of a he. Should a situation arise where it was necessary to reply "yes" or "no," then they must resign themselves to a downinght "No." "What harm would it do," he said on July 15, according to quite trustworthy notes, " " if a man told a good, lusty lie in a worthy cause and for the sake of the Christian Churches ?" Similarly he said on July 17: "To lie in case of necessity, or for convenience, or in excuse, such lying would not be against God: He was ready to take such lies on Himself."

The Protestant historian of the Hessian Bigamy save in excuse of this: "Luther was faced by the problem whether a lie told in case of necessity could be regarded as a sin at all"; he did not have recourse to the "expedient of a mental reservation [as he had done when recommending an ambiguous reply]"; he merely absolved "the 'mendacusm officiorum ' [the useful lie] of sinfulness. This done, Luther could with a good conscience advise the telling of such a lie. 194

Nevertheless Luther felt called upon again to return to the alleged Confession made. He is even anxious to make out that his memorandum had been an Absolution coming under the Seal of Confession, and that the Absolution mucht not be "revealed": " If the Confession was to be regarded as secret, then the Absolution also must be secret."1 " He considered the reply given in Confession as an Absolution." mays Rockwell. Moreover he gave it to be understood, that, should the Landgrave say he had committed bugarry as a right to which he was entitled, and not as a favour, then he. Luther, was quit of all responsibility; it was not the confessor's business to give public testimony concerning what had taken place in Confession.

^{* &}quot;Philipps Briefwechsel," I, p. 369 f.

* Bod., p. 378. Concerning the notes which the editor calls the "Protokoll," see N. Paulus in "Hist.-pol. Bl.," 135, 1905, p. 323 f.

^{*} Ibid , p. 375. * Rockwell, ibid., p. 179. The Protestant theologian Th. Brieger mys ("Luther und die Nebenehe," etc., "Preuss. Jahro.," 135, 1909, p. 46): "As a known, in the summer of 1540, when the matter had already been actorious for months, Luther gave the Landgrave the advice, that he should give a flat denial of the step he had taken. . . . 'A he of necessity was not against God; He was ready to take that upon Humself -Just as in our own day men of the highest moral character hold similar views concerning certain forms of the he of Become ty."

Practically, however, according to the notes of the conference, his advice still was that the Landgrave should conceal the bigamy behind the ambiguous declaration that : "Margaret is a concubine." Under the influence of the hostility to the bigazzy shown by the Saxon Courts he urged so strongly the Bible arguments against polygamy, that the Hessians began to fear his withdrawal from his older standpoint.

The Old-Testament examples, he declared emphatically, could mether "exclude nor bind, " i.e. could not settle the matter either way . Paul's words could not be overthrown ; in the New Testament nothing could be found (in favour of bigumy), " on the contrary the New Testament confirmed the original metitution [monogamy]"; therefore "since both the Divine and the secular law were at one, nothing sould be done against it, he would not take it upon his conscience. ' It is true, that, on the other side, must be put the statement, that he saw no reason why " "Philippa Briefwocheel," 1, p. 373.

Cp. Rockwell, sted., p. 175, with a reference to Lether's statement of July 17: If the Landgrave would not be content with a disputan-tion, and claimed it on a right, then they were quit of their advice." and claimed it as a right, then they were quit of their advice " (* Philippe Briefwechool,* 1, p. 370). It is deficult to follow Luther through all his attempts to evode the man.

^{*} P. 183.—Reckwel. (p. 181, n. 4) also reminds us that Luther had written to the Kisster. "In matters of Confession it is seemly that both. the excusate now and the advice given in Confession "about he kept emoret. Luther, in 'Lauterteche Tagebuch," p. 196, are p. 37, a. 2. The Eleuter wrote to the Landgrave in a letter dated June 21, 1849 (queted by Ruckwell, ided., from the archives), that the marriage doubt put he openly discussed, because, otherwise, "the Seel of Conjunction would be broken in regard to those who had given the dispression." In this he re-when Lutime.—Hockwell, p. 162 (ep. p. 183, n. 3), thinks, that Lutime was following the "more rigorous" theological of thinks, that Lution was following the "more rigorous" theological of uncless days, who had tought that it was "a merical air for the positiont to reveal what the press had told him." This is not the place to restily puch massandersteralings.

the Prince should not take the matter upon his own conscience, deciare himself convinced, and thus "set their [the theo-logians] consciences free." That he still virtually stood by what had happened, is also seen from his plain statement : "Many things are right before God in the tribunal of experience, which, to the world, must appear wrong " "Is support of this he brought forward the example," so the report of the Conference proceeds, "of the seduction of a virgin and of an illegitimate birth." He also has stress on the principle that they, the theologians, had merely "to duspuse according to God a commend in the tribunal of conscience," but were unable to bear witness to it publicly; hence their advice to the Landgrave had in reality never been given at all, for it was no business of the "forum externom"; the Landgrave had acted in accordance with his own ideas, just as he had undertaken many things "against their advice," for instance, "the raid on Wirtenbergh." He was doing the same in "this instance too, and acting on his own advice."

Again, for his own safety, he makes a request: "Beg him the Prince] most diligently to draw in [to keep it secret]," otherwise, so he threatens, he will declare that "Luther arted like a fool, and will take the shame on himself '; he would "say: I made a meaning and I retract it; he would setrect it even at the exposure of his own headur, as for his bosour he would pray God to restore it."

In a written memorandum which he presented during the Conference he makes a similar threat, which, however, as already shown in the case of Thann (above, p. 40 f.), it is wrong to take as meaning that he really declared he had acted wrongly in the advice given to the Landgrave.

He begs the Landgrave, "again to concend the matter and keep at secret . for to defend it publicly as right was impossible ' ; should the Landgrave, however, he determined, by revealing it, to "cause annoyance and disgrace to our Confession, Churches and Estaton,' then it was his duty beforehand to comult all them as to whether they were willing to take the responsibility, since without them the matter could not take place and Luther and Melanchthon sione "could do nothing without their authority. And rather than sesset in publicly defending it, I would repudente my advises and Master Philip a [Mclanchthon's], were it made public, for it was not a public miviou, and is annulled by publication. Or, if this is no use, and they must on calling it a counsel and not a Confession, which it really was, then I should rather admit that I made a mutake and acted foolishly and now wave for parties; for the areadal is great and intolerable. And my graceous Lord the Landgrave ought not to forget that his florum Highman was lucky enough in he ng able to take the garl secretly with a good consciones, by virtue of our advice in Confession; soming that H.S.H. has no need or course for runking the matter public, and can easily keep it correct, which would obviate all this great trouble and amifortune. Beyond that I shall not go."h

1 "Bobto," not "Bitto," as clearly the true rending hero.

^{3. &}quot;Phihpps Briefweches," 1, p. 373 f. "Anal. Lath.," ed. Kolds, p. 364 aug.

These attempts at explanation and subserfuge to which the andly embarramed gathers of the "testimony " had recourse were beenly arthrard by Feige, the Hessian Chancellor, in the sobur legal replace given by him at the Conference ! He positive out, that. The Lancigrave, his menter, could not now ' regard at admit his marriage to be a more fastern " , he would indeed keep at correct on far as its him lay, but dony it he could not without prejudice to his own honour; "since it has become so widely known "; there to whom he had appealed, " as the chiefs of our Christian Churches, for a testimony, 'vis. Luther and his theologicae, must not now leave him in the lurch. "but her Unitaria, should necessity gree, that he had not arted unshrutually in this matter, in against God." Philip, moreover, from the very first, had no intention of reserving the master to the private tribuing of conscience, the request brought by Bucer pinirly showed, that he "was publicly printioning the tribunal of the Church." The fact is that the instructions given to Been cleary conveyed the France s intention of making public the bigning and the advice by which it was justified

Honce, presended Frage. Out with it plainly, out with the theological grounds which "moved the thock grant to grant such a dependence to If these grounds were not against God, then the Landgrave could take his stand on their between the secular law, the Emperor, the Fural and the Cours of Justice. Should the theologians, however, really with to "reputinte" their advice, nothing would be gained, the srandal would be just as great and they had "admitted" it; and further it would cause a split in their own confession, for the Prisce would be obliged to " disclose the advise". Lather wested to get out of the hole by saving he had acted foolishly! Did he not see how " detather tal this would be to his reputation and teaching ' ? He abould "consider what he had written in his Exposition of Content twelve years previously, and that this had never been called into question by my of his disciples or followers." His stould remember all that had been done against the Papary the righ his work, for with hit to his his pove for him assertion than for the disjonantion, and which "never below had been accepted and maintained, in equivation to the worldly powers, by an appeal to a Christian Council."

Hence the Landgrove must urserily request, concludes Ferge, that the theologians would, at least—until the Louisid. Take his part and " adout that what he had done had been agreeable to God."

The Sixon representatives present at the Conference

Briefe, S. B. 272 f., duted July 20, 1540
 Kolde, inc. cita. p. 4-7, 4-4.

were, however, ready to follow the source indicated by Luther in case of necessity, vis. to tell a downright he; rather than that the Prince should be forced to vindicate openly his position it was better to deny it flatly. They declared, without, however, convincing the Conference, "that a flat denial was less culpable before God and in conscience—as could be proved by many examples from Scripture—than to cause a great scandal and lamentable falling away of many good people by a plain and open admission and vindication."

Philip of Hesse was not particularly edified by the result of the Essenach Conference. Of all the reports which gradually reached him, those which most aroused his resentment were, first, that Luther should expect him to tell a lic and deny the second marriage, and, secondly, his threat to withdraw the testimony, as issued in error.

Luther had, so far, avoided all direct correspondence with the Landgrave concerning the disastrous affair. Now, however, he was forced to make some statement in reply to a not very friendly letter addressed to him by the Prince.⁴

In this Philip, alluding to the invitation to tell a lie, says: "I will not lie, for lying has an evil sound and no Apostle or even Christian has ever taught it, nay, Christ has forbidden it and said we should keep to yea and nay. That I should declare the lady to be a whore, that I refuse to do, for your advice does not permit of it. I should surely have had no need of your advice to take a whore, neither does it do you credit." Yet he declares himself ready to give an "obscure reply," i.e. an ambiguous one; without need he would not disclose the marriage.

Nor does Luther's threat of retracting the advice and of saying that he had "acted foolishly" affright him. The threat he unceremoniously calls a bit of foolery. "As to what you told my Councillors, viz. that, rather than reveal my reasons, you would say you had acted foolishly, please don't commit such folly on my account, for then I will confess the reasons, and, in case of necessity, prove them now or later, unless the witnesses die in the meantime." "Nothing more dreadful has ever come to my cars than that it should have occurred to a brave man to retract what he had granted by a written dispensation to a troubled conscience. If you can answer for it to God, why do you fear and shrink from the world? If the matter is right ' in conscientia ' before the Almighty, the Eternal and Immortal God, what does the accursed, andomitic, usurious and besotted world matter?" Here he is using the very words in which Luther was wont to speak of the world and of the contempt with which it should be met. He proceeds with a touch of sarcasm: "Would to God that you and your like would inveigh against and punish those in whom you see such things daily, i.e. adultery, usury and drunkennessand who yet are supposed to be members of the Church—not merely in writings and sermons but with serious considerations and the ban which the Apostles employed, in order that the whole world may not be scandalised. You see these things, yet what do you and the others do ? " In thus finding fault with the Wittenberg habits, he would appear to include the Elector of Saxony, who had a reputation for intemperance. He knew that Luther's present attitude was in part determined by consideration for his sovereign. In his irritation he also has a sly but at the Wittenberg theologians: At Eisenach his love for the "lady" (Margaret) had been looked upon askanee: "I confess that I love her, but in all honour. . . . But that I should have taken her because she pleased me, that is only natural, for I see that you holy people also take those that please you. Therefore you may well bear with me, a poor sinner."

¹ Kolde, loc. cit., p. 362 seq

Dated July 18, 1540, 'Philipps Briefwechsel," I, p. 380 ff.

Luther replied on July 24,1 that he had not deserved that the Landgrave should write to him in so angry a tone. The latter was wrong in supposing, that he wanted to get his neck out of the noose and was not doing all that he could to "serve the Prince humbly and faithfully." It was not no his own account that he wished to keep his advice secret; "for though all the devils wished the advice to be made public, I would give them by God's Grace such an answer that they would not find any fault in it."

It was, so Luther says in this letter, a secret counsel as "all the devils" knew, the keeping secret of which he had requested, "with all diligence," and which, even at the worst, he would be the last to bring to light. That he, or the Prince himself, was bound to minuce by the first of Confession, he does not say though that would have been the place to suspinesse it. He therety states that he knew what, in the case of a troubled conscience, " might be remitted out of mercy twices God," and what was not right apart from this necessity. "I should be morry to sun your Hereno Highroun starting a literary fend with ma." It was true he could not allow the Prince, who was "of the more faith " as himself, " to secur danger and diegrace " but, should he decline the coursel, the thous game would not be in a punction to " get him out of the bother," because, in the eyes of the world, "even a hundred Lathers, Philips and others could not charge the law. the secret marriage could never be publicly held as valid, though valid in the tribunal of conscience. He wished to press the matter before the worldly authorities, but here the Prince's marriage would never be acknowledged. he would only be exposing himself to ponuition, and withdrawing himself from the 'protection and ametance of the Divine Judgment " under which he atout to long to he regarded it to a marriago morely in conscience.

" Briefe," ed. De Wette, 6, p. 273 ff.

In this letter Luther opposes the "making public of the advice," which he dreaded, by the most powerful motive at his command: The result of the disclosure would be, that "at less your floress Highsens would be obliged to put away your sweetheart as a more where." He would do bester to allow her to be now regarded as a "whore, although to us three, i.e. in God's light, size in really a weighted concubrant'; in all this the Prince would stall have a good commence, "for the whole affer was due to his distress of conscience, as we believe, and, hence, to your Bereso Highness a connecence, the most more prestitute."

There were, however, three more letter pile for the Landgrave In evalow. He had pleaded his distress of conscience. Lather hints, that, "one of our best freeds," had said : "The Land. grave would not be able to persuade anyone " that the bigamy was due to chateurs of come sence , which was as a uch as to any, that Dr Martin believed what it was impossible to believe, had decorved himself and been witingly led astray Me, Latther, bowover, still thought that the Pance had been evicus in what he had eard. " secretly up Confermen " ; nevertheless the more europerion roight suffice to " render the advice worthism" and then Philip would stand alone. . . . The Landgrave, moreover, had unundly hinted in his latter, that, " we theological take those who please tm." "Why do not you [Princes] do different y f " be replied. "1, as benet, trust that this will be your Serven highness a experience with your beloved eweetheart." "Pretty women are to be wedded other for the make of the children which spring from this merry union, or to prevent form cation. Apart from this I do not see of what one beauty is ". " Marry in baste and report at insure " was the result of following our prestons, according to the proverb. Lastly, Luther does not hide from the Land grave that his enrecements in keeping the excret had brought not only the Prince but "the whole confusion" into disrepute, though "the good people" belonging to the faith were really in no way involved in what Philip had done. "If each were to do what pleased him and throw the responsibility on the pious" this would be neither just nor reasonable.

Funce from his idea of publishing the fatal Wittenberg " advice," to impel him to allow the marriage to " remain an "ombiguous," and " not openly to heast that he had lawfully wedded his sweetheart."

He also gives Philip to understand that he will got a teste of the real Luther should be not obey him, or should be expose him by publishing the "advice," or otherwise in writing. He says: "If it comes to writing I shall know how to extricate myself and leave your Serene Highness sticking in the mud, but this I shall not do unless I can't help it." The Prince's almoin to the Emperor's anger which must be avoided, did not afright Luther in the least. In his concluding words his conviction of his musion and the thought of the satis-Evangelical attitude of the Emperor carry him away. "Were this message to become earnest, I should tweak the Emperor's forelock, confront him with his practices and read him a good fecture on the texts. "Every man is a list" and "Put not your trust in Princes." Was he not indeed a list and a false man, he who "rages against God's own truth," i.e. opposes Luther's Evangel?

Faced by such unbounded defiance Philip and his luckless bigarny, in spite of the assurance he saw fit to assume, seemed indeed in a bad way. One can feel how Luther despised the man. In spite of his painful embarrassment, he is aware of his advantage. He indeed stood in need of the Landgrave's assistance in the matter of the new Church system, but the latter was entirely dependent on Luther's help in his disastrous affair.

Hence Philip, in his reply, is more amiable, though he really demolishes Luther's objections. This reply he sent the day after receiving Luther's letter.3

Certain words which had been let fall at Eisenach had "enraged and maddened" him (Philip). He had, however, good "scriptural warrant for his action," and Luther should not forget that, "what we did, we did with a good conscience." There was thus no need for the Prince to bow before the Wittenbergers. "We are well aware that you and Philip [Melanchthon] cannot defend us against the secular powers, nor have we ever asked this of you." "That Margaret should not be looked upon as a prostitute, this we demand and insist upon, and the presence of pious men-[Melanchthon, etc.] at the wedding, your advice, and the marriage contract, will prove what she is." "In fine, we will allow it to remain a secret marriage and dispensation, and will give a reply which shall conceal the matter, and be neither yea nor may, as long as we can and may." He insists, however, that, " if we cannot prevent it," then we shall bring the Wittenberg advice "into the light of day."

¹ On July 27, " Philippa Briefwechiel," 1, p. 385 ff.

As to telling a downright he, that was impossible, because the marriage contract was in the hands of his second wife's friends, who would at once take him to task.

" It was not our intention to enter upon a wordy conflict, or to set your pen to work." Luther had said, that he would know how to get out of a tight corner, but what business was that of Philip's: " We care not whether you get out or in." As to Luther's malicious allusion to his love for the beautiful Margaret, he says: "Since she took a fancy to us, we were fonder of her than of another, but, had she not liked us, then we should have taken another." Hence he would have committed bigamy in any case. He waxes surcestic about Luther's remark, that the world would never acknowledge her as his sufe, hinting that Luther's own wife, and the consorts of the other preachers who had formerly been monks or priests, were likewise not regarded by the imperial lawyers as lawful wedded wives. He looked upon Margaret as his " wife according to God's Word and your advice; such is God's will; the world may regard our wife, yours and the other preachers' as it pleases."

Philip, however, was diplomatic enough to temper all this with friendly assurances. "We esteem you," he says, "as a very emment theologian, nor shall we doubt you, so long as God continues to give you His Spirit, which Spirit we still recognise in you. . . . We find no fault with you personally and consider you a man who looks to God. As to our other thoughts, they are just thoughts, and come and go duty free."

These "duty-free" thoughts, as we readily gather from the letter, concerned the Courts of Saxony, whose influence on Luther was a thorn in the Landgrave's flesh. There was the "haughty old Vasht: " at Dresden (Duchess Catherine), without whom the "matter would not have gone so far ". then, again, there was Luther's "Lord, the Elector," The "cunning of the children of the world," which the Landgrave feared would infect Luther, had its head-quarters at these Courts. But if it came to the point, such things would be "disclosed and manifested" by him, the Landgrave, to the Elector and "many other princes and nobles," that "you would have to excuse us, because what we did was not done merely from love, but for conscience's sake and in order to escape eternal damnation; and your Lord, the Elector, will have to admit it too and be our witness." And in still stronger language, he " cites " the Elector, or, rather, both the Elector and himself, to appear before Luther: " If this be not sufficient, then demand of us, and of your master, that we tell you in confession such things as will satisfy you concerning us. They would, however, sound ill, so help me God, and we hope to God that He will by all means preserve us from such in future. You wish to learn it, then learn it, and do not look for anything good but for the worst, and if we do not speak the truth, may God strike us "; "to prove it " we are quite ready. Other things (see below, xxiv., 2) make it probable, that the Elector is here accused as being Philip's partner in some very serious sin. It looks as though Philip's intention was to frighten him and prevent his proceeding further against him. Since Luther in all probability brought the letter to the cognisance of the Elector, the step was, politically, well thought out.

Melanchthon's Complaints.

Melanchthon, as was usual with him, adopted a different tone from Luther's in the matter. He was very sad, and wrote lengthy letters of advice.

As early as June 15, to ease his mind, he sent one to the Elector Johann Frederick, containing numerous arguments against polygamy, but leaving open the possibility of secret bigamy. Friends informed the Landgrave that anxiety about the bigamy was the cause of Melanchthon's serious illness. Philip, on the other hand, wrote, that it was the Saxon Courts which were worrying him. Owing to his weakness he was unable to take part in the negotiations at Eisenach. On his return to Wittenberg he declared aloud that he and Luther had been outwitted by the malice of Philip of Hesse. The latter's want of secreey seemed to show the treasonable character of the intrigue. To Camerarms he wrote on Aug. 24: "We are disgraced by a horrid business concerning which I must say nothing. I will give you the details in due time."1 On Sep. 1, he admits in a letter to Veit Dietrich: "We have been deceived, under a semblance of piety, by another Jason, who protested conscientious motives in seeking our assistance, and who even swore that this expedient was essential for him." He thus gives his friend a peep into the Wittenberg advice, of which he was the draughtsman, and in which he, unlike Luther, could ace nothing that came under the Seal of Confession. The name of the deceitful polygamist Jason he borrows from Terence, on whom he was then lecturing. Luther, about the same time, also quotes from Terence when speaking at table about Philip's bigamy, we may infer that he and Melanchthon had exchanged ideas on the work in question (the "Adelphs"). Melanchthon was also fond of dubbing the Hessian "Alcibiades" on account of his dissembling and cunning.*

¹ Rockwell, loc. cit., p. 190. Cp. p. 61.

³ Ibed., p. 192, from Philip's letter to Lather, on July 18.

Most remarkable, however, is the assertion he makes in his annoyance, viz. that the Landgrave was on the point of losing his reason: "This is the beginning of his insanity."4 Luther, too, had said he frared he was going crazy, as it ranin the family. Philip's father, Landgrave William II, had succumbed to melancholia as the result of syphilia. latter's beother, William I, had also been insane. Philip's son, William IV, sought to explain the family trouble by a spell cast over one of his ancestors by the "courtisans" at Venice. In 1588, previous to the bigamy scandal, Henry of Brunswick had written, that the Landgrave, owing to the French disease, was able to sleep but little, and would soon go mad."

Melanchthon became very sensitive to any mention of the Hessian bigamy At table, on one occasion in Aug., 1540, <sup>Rockwell, icc. cut., p. 193.

Ibid., p. 194.
Alcobiades nature non Achilles." Corp. ref., 3, p. 1079. Cp.</sup>

^{4,} p. 116. Rockwell, stid., p. 194.

"Hose sent principle furorie." Mathemas, "Tuchreden," p. 143. Above, p. 46.

^{*} Ibid., on the same day (June 11, 1540), Luther's statement. Above, p. 44.

Rockwell, ibid., p. 150, n. 2; p. 4, n. 1.
 Ibid., p. 102.

Luther spoke of love; no one was quite devoid of love because all at least desired enjoyment; one loved his wife, another his children, others, like Carlstad!, loved honour. When Bugenhagen, with an allusion to the Landgrave, quoted the passage from Virgil's "Bucolica": "Omnia vincit arear at nos sesamus amors," Mclanchthon jumped up and cried: "Pastor, leave out that passage."

Brooding over the permission given, the scholar sought earnestly for grounds of excuse for the bigamy. "I looked well into it beforehand," he writes in 1548, "I also told the Ductor [Luther] to weigh well whether he could be mixed up in the offsir. There are, however, circumstances of which the women [their Ducal opposents at Messea] are not aware, and understand not. The man [the Landgrave] has many strange ideas on the Desty. He also confided to me things which I have told no one but Dr. Martin; on account of all this we have had no small trouble." We must not press the contradiction this presents to Melanchthon's other statement concerning the Prince's hypocrisy.

Melanchthon's earlier letter dated Sep. 1, 1540, Cameranus ventured to publish in the collection of his friend's letters only with omissions and additions which altered the meaning.

Until 1904 this letter, like Melanchthon's other letter on Luther's marriage (vol. is, p. 176), was only known in the amended form. W. Rockwell has now published the following suppressed passages from the original in the Chigians at Roma, according to the manuscript prepared by Nichrles Multer for the new scitton of Melanchthon's correspondence. Here Melanchthon speaks out plainly without being conscious of any "Secret of Confession," and sees little objection to the complete publication by the Wittenbergers of their advice. "I blame no one in this matter except the man who deceived us with a simulated piety ("simulations pietotic fefelist"). Nor did he achieve to our trusty counsel [to keep the matter secret]. He aware that the remedy was necessary. Therefore, that the universal biblical precept [concerning the unity of marriage]: "They shall be two in one ^{*} Mathemus, "Tischreden," p. 175, 7-24 Aug., 1540.

* To the Elector Johann Frederick, March, 1543, see Rockwell p. 199 f., from achieve. It camell quotes the following from a passage in which several words have been struck out: "I have a ways preferred that he [...!] should deal with the matter, than that he should altogether [...!]." Was the meaning. He preferred that lastler should be involved in such as offer rather than that he handler we should desert their party altogether! Other atternages of Meanchthou's and Luther's, given above, would favour this seems.

fiech ' might be preserved, we counselled him, secretly, and without giving scandal to others, to make use of the remedy in case of necessity. I will not be judge of his conscience, for he still stirks to his assertion; but the scandal he might well have evoided had be chosen. Either (what follows is in Greek) love got the upper hand, or here is the beginning and foretasts of that meanity which runs in the family. Luther blamed him severely and he thereupon promised to keep aleace. But . . . [Melanchthon has crossed out the next sentence : As time goes on he changes his views whatever he may do in the matter, we are free to publish our decimers (" edere sententiam nostrum"); for in it too we vindicated the law. He himself told me, that formerly he had thought otherwise, but certain people had convinced him that the thing was quite indifferent. He has unlearned men about him who have written him long dissertations, end who are not a little angry with me because I bismed them to their teeth. But in the beginning we were ignorant of their prejudices." He goes on to speak of Philip as "deprayed by an Alcibradean nature (* Alcibradea natura perditus "L" an expression which also fell under the red pencil of the first editor. Comersion 3.

Literary Feud with Duke Henry of Brunewick.

Prominent amongst those who ecusured the bigamy was the Landgrave's violent opponent Duke Henry of Brunswick-Wolfenbuttel. The Duke, a leader of the Catholic Alliance formed to resist the Schmalkalden Leaguers in North Germany, published in the early 'forties several controversial works against Philip of Hesse. This brisk and active opponent, whose own character was, however, by no means unblemished, seems to have had a hand in the attacks of other pension upon the Landgrave. Little by little he secured fairly accurate accounts of the proceedings in Hesse and at Wittenberg, and, as early as July 22, 1540, made a general and public reference to what had taken place.*

In a tract published on Nov. 8, he said quite openly that the Landgrave had "two wives at the same time, and had thus rendered himself liable to the penalties against double marriage." The Elector of Saxony had, however, permitted. "his biblical experts at the University of Wittenberg to assist in dealing with these nice affairs," nay, had himself concurred in the bigamy."

Bookwell, 664., p. 184. Text of Carnerarius in "Corp. ref., 3,
 p. 1077 eq. 3

Becter Johann Frederick, the "drunken Nation of Seneny," so the author terms bizz.

84 LUTHER THE REFORMER

In consequence of these and other charges contained in the Duke's screed. Luther wrote the violent libel entitled "Wider Hans Worst," of which the still existing manuscript shows in what haste and frame of mind the work was dashed off. All his emsperation at the events connected with the bigamy now become public boils up in his attack on the "Bloodhound, and incendiary Harry "of Brunswick, and the "clerical devil's whores in the Popish robbers' cave."1 Of Henry's charge he speaks in a way which is almost more than a mere concealing of the bigamy. He adds; "The very name of Harry stinks like devil's ordure freshiv dropped in Germany. Did he perchance desire that not be alone should study so hormbly in the nostrils of others, but that he should make other honourable princes to stink also?" He was a renegade and a coward, who did everything like an assassin. "He ought to be set up like a eunuch, dressed in cap and bells, with a feather-brush in his hand to guard the women and that part on account of which they are called women, as the rude Germans say." " Assassin-adultery, assassin-arson indeed became this "wild cat." " etc.

Even before this work was finished, in February, 1541, a pseudonymous attack upon the Landgrave appeared which "horrified Cruciger," who was with Lather at Wittenberg. The Landgrave is here upbraided with the bigamy, the reproaches culminating in the following: "I cannot but believe that the devil resides in your Screne Highness, and ⁸ Rockwell, st.st., p. 107, on the writing of ⁶ Justimus Waranger ⁸ against the Landgrave, with a reference to ¹¹ Corp. ref., ²¹ 4, p. 119.

Werke," Ecl. ed., 26, p. 50.

^{*} Hold, p. 17: "Concorning the Landgrave, where he abuses as bigarrous, an Anahaptast and even as having submitted to re-baptism, though in such ambiguous terms as to suit a cardinal or a weather-cook, so that were his proofs saked for he could twist his tongue round and easy, that he was not sure it was so, but morely imspected if , , , of this I will not now say much. The Landgraves is man insough and has fearned men about him. I know of one Landgravine in Home fore only bore the title), who is and is to be styled wife and mother in Hesse, and, in any case, no other will be able to bear young Princes and suckle thorn; I refer to the Ducheus, daughter of Duke George of Saxony And if her Frince has strayed, that was owing to your bad example, which has brought things to such a pass, that the very pessan is do not look upon it as an, and have made it difficult for up to maintain matrimony in honour and esseem, may, to re-establish it. From the very beginning none has abused matrimony more grievously than Harry of Wolffenbüttel, the hely, solver man." That is all Listher anys of the Homeon bigarny.

that the Münster habit has infected your S.H., so that your S.H. thinks that you may take as many wives as you please, even as the King of Münster did."

An anonymous reply to this screed penned by the pastor of Melsungen, Johann Lening, is the first attempt at a public justification of Philip's bigamy. The author only disclaims the charge that the Landgrave had intended to "introduce a new 'iss.' "1

Henry of Brunswick replied to "Hans Worst" and to this vindication of the bigamy in his "Quadruplice" of May 31, 1541. He said there of Luther's " Hans Worst ": "That we should have roused Luther, the arch-knave, archheret.c, desperate seoundrel and godless arch-miscreant, to put forth his impious, false, unchristian, lousy and rescally work is due to the scamp [on the throne] of Saxony." " We have told the truth so plainly to his Munsterite brother, the Landgrave, concerning his bigamy, that he has been unable to deny it, but admits it, only that he considers that he did not act dishonourably, but rightly and in a Christian fashion. which, however, is a he and utterly untrue." In some of his allegations then and later, such as that the Landgrave was thinking of taking a third wife " in addition to his numerous concubines," and that he had submitted to re-baptism, the princely knight-errant was going too far. A reply and defence of the Landgrave, published in 1544, asserts with unconscious humour that the Landgrave knew how to take seriously "to heart what God had commanded concerning marriage . . . and also the demands of conjugal fidelity and love."

Johann Lening, pastor of Melsuagen, formerly a Carthunan in the monastery of Eppenberg, had been the most zealous promoter of the bigamy. He was also very active in rendering literary service in its defence. The string of Bible proofs alleged by Philip in his letter to Luther of July 18 (above, p. 55 f.) can undoubtedly be traced to his inspiration. In October, 1541, he was at Augsburg with Gereon Sailer, the physician so skilled in the treatment of syphilis; a little later Vest Dietrich informed Melanchthon of his venereal trouble. He was much disliked by the Saxons and the Wittenbergers on account of his defence of tv 🗝 🗈

Google

¹ Cp. Rockwell, ibid., p. 108.

Philippe Bris(wechee.," 3, 1891, p. 180, n. 1.
 On Dec. 11, 1541. Rockwell, ibid., p. 117, n. 1.

his master. Chancellor Brück speaks of him as a "violent, bitter man"; Luther calls him the "Melaingen nebulo" and the "monstrum Carthusianum"; Frederick Myconius speaks of the "lenones Leningi" and fears he will eatch the "Dionysiorum vesania."

Such was the author of the "Dialogue of Huiderieus Neobulus," which has become famous in the history of the Hessian Bigamy; it appeared in 1541, towards the end of summer, being printed at Marburg at Philip's expense.

The book was to answer in the affirmative the question contained in the sub-title: "Whether it be in accordance with or contrary to the Divine, natural, Imperial and ecclesiastical law, to have simultaneously more than one wife." The author, however, clothed his affirmation in so pedantic and involved a form as to make it unintelligible to the uninitiate so that Philip could say that, "it would be a temptation to nobody to follow his example," and that it tended rather to dissuade from bigamy than to induce people to commit it."

This work was very distasteful to the Courts of Saxony, and Luther soon made up his mind to write against it.

He wrote on Jan. 10, 1542, to Justus Menius, who had sent him a reply of his own, intended for the press : "Your book will go to the printers, but mine is already waiting publication; your turn will come next. . . . How this man disgusts me with the insipid, foolish and worthless arguments he exerctes." To this Pandora all the Hessian gods must have contributed. "Bucer smells had enough already on account of the Ratisbon dealings. . . May Christ keep us well disposed towards Him and steadfast in His Holy Word. Amen." From what Luther says he was not incensed at the Dialogue of Neobulus so much on account of its favouring polygamy itself, but because, not content with allowing bigamy conditionally, and before the tribunal und Kritiken," 57, 1884, p. 566.)

1 be Landgrave to Saver, Aug 27, 1841, in "Philipps Brief-wechsel," 3, p. 148, and to Melanchthon.

See above, pote 1.

To Justus Merius. Jan. 10, 1543, "Briefe," ed De Wette, 5, p. 426. Cp. above, p. 251., for Luther's opinion that Lennig had been the first to suggest the plan of the lagarny to the Landgrave. For other points in the text, see Rockwell, ib d., p. 1271. Ruklewey remarks of Lening that "his wretched servicty and his own fax morals had made him the advocate of the Landgrave's carnal limits." ("Theol. Studien and Kritiken," 57, 1884, p. 566.)

of conscience, it sought also to exect it into a public law. When, however, both Elector and Landgrave' begged him to refrain from publishing his reply, he agreed and stopped the printers, though only after a part of it had already left the press."

His opinion concerning the permissibility of bigamy in certain cases he never changed in spite of the opposition it met with. But, in Luther's life, hardly an instance can be cited of his having shrunk back when attacked. Rarely if ever did his defiance-which some admire-prove more momentous than on this occasion. An upright man is not unwilling to allow that he may have been mistaken in a given instance, and, when better informed, to retract, Luther, too, might well have appealed to the shortness of the time allowed him for the consideration of the counsel he had given at Wittenberg. Without a doubt his hand had been forced. Further, it might have been alleged in excuse for his act, that misapprehension of the Bible story of the patriarchs had dragged him to consequences which he had not foreseen. It would have been necessary for him to revise completely his Old-Testament exegesis on this point, and to free it from the influence of his disregard of ecclesiastical tradition and the existing huntations on matrimony. In place of this, consideration for the exalted rank of his petitioners induced him to yield to the plausible reasons brought forward by a smooth-tongued agent and to remain alent.

The tract of Menius, on the same political grounds, was likewise either not published at all or withdrawn later. The truth was, that it was desirable that the Hessian affair should come under discussion as little as possible, so that no grounds should be given " to increase the gossip," as Luther put it in 1542; "I would rather it were left to settle as it began, than that the filth should be stirred up under the noses of the whole world."*

In the letter to Melanchthon, quoted p. 66, note 2, Philip says, that if Lather's work had not yet appeared Melanchthon was to explain to him that the Dislogue of Neubulus tended rather to downade from, than to permit bigamy, "so that he reight forbear from such [reply], or so moderate it that it may not injure us or what he himself previously sunctioned and wrote [i.e. in the Wittenberg testimony] "

Franted in "Werks," Erl. ed., 55, p. 206 ff.

Luther to the Electoral Chancellor, Bruck, "shortly after Jan. 10," [&]quot;Briefe," 6, p. 196, where he also approvingly notes that Menus had

The work of Neobulus caused much heart-burning among the Swiss reformers; of this we hear from Bullinger, who also, in his Commentary on Matthew, in 1542, expressed himself strongly against the tract. His successor, Rudolf Gualther, Zwingh's son-in-law, wrote that it was shocking that a Christian Prince should have been guilty of such a thing and that theologians should have been found to father, advocate and defend it. 2

In time, however, less was heard of the matter and the rumours died down. A peace was even patched up between the Landgrave and the Emperor, chiefly because the Elector of Saxony was against the Schmalkalden League being involved in the Hessian affor. Without admitting the reality of the bigamy, and without even mentioning it, Philip concluded with Charles V a treaty which secured for him safety. Therein he made to the Emperor political concessions of such importances as to arouse great discontent and grave suspicions in the ranks of the Evangelicals. At a time when the German Protestants were on the point of appealing to France for assistance against Charles V. he promised to do his best to hinder the French and to support the Imperial interests. In the matter of the Emperor's feud with Julich, he pledged himself to neutrality, thus ensuring the Emperor's success. After receiving the Imperial pardon. on Jan 24, 1541, his complete reconciliation was guaranteed by the secret compact of Ratisbon on June 18 of the same year. He had every reason to be content, and as the editor of Philip's correspondence with Bucer writes, what better could even the Emperor desire? The great danger which threatened was a lengue of the German Profesiants. with France. And now the Prince, who alone was able to bring this about, withdrew from the opposition party, laid his eards on the table, left the road open to Guillers, offered not written ""costra necessitatem et casuellem diepeniationem individuapersons," of which we, as confessors, treated"; he only "invergied controllegens at exemption publicum polygamia," which we also do." Still be finds that Memas" excuses the old patriarchs too feebly."

* On his outburst against " those who teach polygamy " in his " In evar 2 hun z. Mt Commentaria," Tiguri, 1543, p. 179

* To Oswald Hyconnu, Sep. 13, 1540, m Rockwell, stid , p. 325 " pudet impormia voter theologoa falcum authorea, tudorea el paironoa penne Paper Fr

3 Cp. Janssen. " Hist. of the German People" (Engl. Trans.), 6, p. 140 f. - and Rockwell, ibid., pp. 130, 132.

Max Lenz, in "Philipps Briefwechsel," 1, p. 497.

his powerful support both within and outside of the Empire, and, in return, asked for nothing but the Emperor a favour. The Landgrave's princely allies in the faith were pained to see him forsake "the opposition (to the Emperor). For their success the political situation was far more promising than in the preceding winter. An alliance with France offered (the Protestants | a much greater prospect of success than one with England, for François I was far more opposed to the Emperor than was Henry VIII. . . . Of the German Princes, William of Julich had already pledged himself absolutely to the French King."1

Philip was even secretly set on obtaining the Pope's sanction to the bigamy. Through Georg von Carlowitz and Julius Pflug he sought to enter into negotiations with Rome; they were not to grudge an outlay of from $000 to 4000 gulden as an "offering." As early as the end of 1541 Chancellor Feige received definite instructions in the matter.

The Hessian Court had, however, in the meantime been informed, that Cardinal Contarini had given it to be understood that " no advice or assistance need be looked for from the Pope."2

Landgravine Christina died in 1549, and, after her death, the unfortunate marriage was gradually buried in obliviou. -But did Landgrave Philip, after the conclusion of the second marriage, cease from immoral intercourse with women as he had so solemnly promised Luther he would?

In the Protestant periodical, "Die christliche Welt," attention was drawn to a Repertory of the archives of Philip of Hesse, published in 1904,4 in which a document is mentioned worth would seem to show that Philip was unfaithful even subsequest to his marriage with Margaret. The all too brief description of the document is as follows: "Suit of Johann Merkhach against Landgrave Philip on behalf of Ludy Margaret; the Landgrave a infidelity; Margaret's demand that her marriage he made public." "This sounds suspicious," remarks W. Kohler, "we have always taken it for granted that the lagamy was moral only an so far in the Landgrave Philip refrained from congago, infiditivy

Max Lons, in "Philippa Briefwechiel," 1, p. 499.
 "Briefwechiel," 151d., p. 368 f.
 Feige to the Landgrave, July 19, 1542, published by Rockwell. etod, p. 331; cp. p. 109 f.

No. 35, August 30, 1906.

^{*} Das politische Archiv des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen; Repertocure des landgräft, polit. Archava, Bill, I. (I noble to men and den Kgl. prouss. Stantaurchaven, Bill, 78). Xvar 1550, No. 27.

after the conclusion, and now we are confronted with this charge, Is it founded t" Concerning this new document N. Paulus remarks: "In order to be able properly to appreciate its importance, we should have to know more of the suit. At any rate Margaret would not have caused representations to be made to her 'husband' concerning his safidelity without very weighty Suppose "14

In the Landgrave's family great descriptation centinued to be felt with Luther. When, in 1575, Philip's son and successor, Landgrave William IV, was entertaining Palegravine Eleabeth, a zenous friend of Lutheraniam, he spoke to her about Luther, as she relates in a letter." "He called Dr. Luther a rescal, because he had persuaded his father to take two wives, and generally made out Dr. Luther to be very wirked. Whereat I said that it could not be true that Lither had done such a thing " So completely had the fact become shrouded in obscunty. William, however, fetched her the original of the Wittenberg testimony. Although she was unwilling to look at it jest her reverence for Lather should suffer, yet she was forced to hear it. In her own words: " He locked me in the room and there I had to remain; he gave it me to read, and my husband (the Palegrave Johann Castruit] who was also with me, and likewise a Zwinghan Dortor both abused Dr. Luther loudly and said we simply looked upon him as an idol and that he was our god. The Landgrave brought out the document and made the Doctor read it aloud so that I might hear it; but I refused to listen to it and thought of something else; seeing I refused to listen the Landgrave gave me a frightful scolding, but afterwards he was sorry and craved pardon.

There is no doubt that William's dahks for Luther, here displayed, played a part in his refusal to accept the formula of Concerd in 1480.

So meagre were the proofs made public of Luther's share in the step which Philip of Hesse had taken, that, even in Hesse, the Giessen professor Michael Siricius was able to declare in a writing of 1879, entitled "Usor was," that Luther's supposed memorandum was an invention 4

Of the Wittenberg " advice " only one, fairly long, but quite apocryphal version, was put in circulation during Köln, Volkszing., 1906, No. 758.

 K. v. Weber, "Arma Churfümtin gu Sachsen," Leipzig, 1865.

p. 40) f. Rockwell, ibid., p. 132 f.

Rockwell, ibid., p. 133. William IV wrote a curious letter to Concetta on this "great book of discord and on the "discercine stele-starum"; see G. Th. Strobel, "Bestrage par Literatur, becomiers des 16. Jahrh.," 2, 1786, p. 142.

1 4 Theologica Witeabergenees at in specie Megalandrum mostrum Lutherum consists one of factum existed til approxime, manifesta feleum est." Rockweil, ibuf., p. 134.

Melanchthon's lifetime; it appeared in the work of Erasmus Sarcenus, "On the holy married state," of which the Preface is dated in 1553. It is so worded as to leave the reader under the impression that its authors had refused outnight to give their consent. Out of caution, moreover, neither the authors nor the addressee are named. In this version, supposed to be Luther's actual text, it was embodied, in 1661, in the Altenburg edition of his works, then in the Leipzig reprint of the same (1729 ff) and again in Walch's edition (Halle, 1740 ff.). Yet Lorenz Beger, in his work " Daphnaus Arcusrius " (1879), had supplied the real text, together with Bucer's instructions and the marriage contract, from "a prominent Imperial Chancery." The importance of these documents was first perceived in France. Bossuet used them in his "Histoire des variations des églises protestantes" (1688)." He was also aware that Landgrave Ernest, of Hesse-Rheinfels-Rotenburg, who returned to the Catholic Church in 1652, had supplied copies of the three documents (to Elector Carl Ludwig of the Palatine). In more recent times Max Lenz's publication of the Hessian archives has verified these documents and supplied a wealth of other material which we have duly utilised in the above.

Opinions Old and New Regarding the Bigamy

As more light began to be thrown on the history of the bigarny, Protestant historians, even apart from these already mentioned, were not slow in expressing their strong condemnation, as indeed was only to be expected.

Julius Boshmer, in outspoken language, points to "the unfortunate fact " that " Luther, in his old age, became weak, ney, flabby in his moral judgments and allowed himself to be guided by political and diplomatic considerations, and not by truth alone and an uncorruptible conscience." 4

Walter Köhler, in the " Historische Zeitschrift," has thrown a strong light on the person and the motives of the Landgrave." Whilst admitting that Philip may have suffered from removes ³ Rockwell, shid., p. 131.

Attenburg ed., 8, p. 977; Leipzig ed., 22, p. 496, Welch's ed., 10, p. 884. (Cp. Walch, 10¹, p. 748) See De Wette in his edition of Luther's Letters, 5, p. 236, and Enders-Kawerau, in "Briefwechsel," 12, p. 319.

Page 221.

Luthers Works für das deutsche Volk, 1907, Introd., p. xvi.

^{• 38}d. 94, 1905, p. 385 ff.

of conscience and depression, he shows how these were "in great part due to his physical deterioration, his unrestrained excesses having brought on him syphilis in its worst form; sores broke out on his hands and he suffered from trouble with the throat." His resolution to commit bigarny also sprang from the same mource, "not from a sudden realisation of the wickwisess of his life, but simply from the source of his physical bankingtry." Bosides, as Kohler points out, the Landgrave's intention was not at first to marry Margaret, but rather to maintain her as nicept woman and so render excesses unnecessary. Plot p, however, was unable to get her as a concubine, owing to the opposition of her mother, who demanded for her daughter the rank of princess and wife. Hence the idea of a bigamy.

The following inclument reference of Cono like pp's must be included amongst the Protestant statements, since it was written some time before the en ment historian joined the Cathone Church; "The revolting story has left a blot on the memory of Luther and Meianchthon which oceans of sophisms will not avail to wash away. Thus, more than any other deed, brought to be it both the way wardness of the new Church and its entire dependence on the favour of Princes."1

As for the concealment, and the accreey in which the sanction of the bigarry was chroniced, G. Ellinger echanders, that the decision of Lather and his formula "became accountely momoral unly through the concealment enjoined by the reformers." In consequence of the matter being made a secret of conscience, "the second wife would seem to the world a consultine..., better not only the first wife, but also the second world suffer degradation. The second wife's relatives had given their consent. 'only on the hypothesis of a real trainings.' this too was what Philip intended; yet Luther wished him to tell the Empeyor that also was a meru concabine, the Landgrave, however, refused to break the word he had given, and "repostated Luther a suggestion that he should tell a lio."

Another Protestant, the historian Paul Tschackert, has recently characterised the Hessian affair as "a dirty story " "It is, and must remain," he says, "a shameful blot on the German Reformation and the life of our reformers. We do not wish to gloss it over, still less to ex use it."

Yet, notably in modern theological iterature, some Protestants have seemed anyons to pullinte the affoir. An attempt is node to place the Wittenberg advice and Luther's subsequent conduct in a more favours de light by emphasising more than heretefore the seer by of the advice given, which Luther did not consider himself justified in revealing under any circumstances, and the publication of which the Landgrave was unjustly demanding. It is also urged, that the ecclesiastical influence of the Middle Ages played its part in Luther's sanction of the bigamy. One author even writes: " the determining factor may have been," that " at the critical moment the reformer made way for the priest and confessor ", elsewhere the same author says, "Thus the Reformation begins with a mediaval scene." Another Protestant theologian thinks that "the tendency, taken over from the Catholic Church," to treat the marriage prohibitions as aspects of the natural law was really responsible; in Luther's evangelical morality "there was a good lump of Romish morality, worthless quartz mingled with good metal "; " Catholic scruples " had dimmed Luther's judgment in the matter of polygamy; to us the idea of bigamy appears "simply monstrous," "but this is a result of age-long habits"; in the 16th century people thought " very differently."

Studien über Kathelmisnen, Protestantsinus und Gewissensfreibe im Deutschland," Schaffhausen, 1857 (anonymous), p. 194.
 Phil. Melanchthon," pp. 348, 482

^{*} Die Entstehung der Jutherischen und reformerten Kirchenlehre," Göttingen, 1910, p. 371.

In the face of the detailed quotations from actual sources already given in the present chapter, all such opinions—not merely Luther's own appeal to a "secret of confession," invented by himself—are seen to be utterly unhistorical. Particularly so is the reference to the Catholic Middle Ages. It was just the Middle Ages, and the ecclesiastical tradition of earlier times, which excited among Luther's contemporaries, even those of his own party, such opposition to the bigarry wherever news of the same penetrated in any shape or form.¹

In the following we shall quote a few opinions of 16th-century Protestants not yet mentioned. With the historian their unanimous verdict must weigh more beavily in the scale than modern theories, which, other considerations apart, labour under the disadvantage of having been brought forward long after the event and the expressions of opinion which accompanied it, to bolster up views commonly held to-day.*

¹ That the death penalty for bigarny also dated from the Middle-Ages need hardly be pointed out.

^{*} For the proofs which follow we may refer to the selection made by N Paulus ("Hist, pol. BL," 147, 1911, p. 503 ff., 561 ff.) in the article 'Dre heusiche Doppelche im Urteile der protest. Zuitgenomen."

74 LUTHER THE REFORMER

The bignery was so strongly opposed to public opinion and thus presumably to the tradition handed down from the Middle Ages, that Nicholas von Amedorf, Litther's friend, decinted the step takes by Philip constituted "a mockery and moult to the Holy Count and a seasofal to the whole of Christendom." He thought as did Justus Jenns, who exclaimed : " Oh, what a great erandal? " and, " Who is not aghest at so great and calamytous a scendal ? " Eramus Alber, preacher at Marburg, speaks of the "ewful scandal" ("emmane scandatum") which must result." In a lotter to the Landgrave in which the Hessian preacher, Anton Corvinia, fours a "great falling away" on account of the affair, he also says, that the world will not "in any way " hear of such a marriage being lewful; his only advice was: "Your Serene Highness must take the matter to heart and, on seconos, have recourse to lying."* To tell a deliberate untruth, as already explained (pp. 29 $3), appeared to other preachers likewise the only possible expedient with which to meet the universal reprobation of contemporaries who judged of the matter from their "mediaval" standpoint.

Justin Menius, the Thuringian preacher, in his work against polygamy mentioned above, appealed to the universal, Divine prohibition which forbids and restrains us," a prohibition which applied equally to the " great once" and ellowed of no dependence. He also pointed out the demoralising effect of a removal of the prohibition in individual cases and the cusming of the devil who wished thereby " to brand the beloved Evangel with infamy," 4

Philip had defied the Church with fifth ("fadiarine"), to wrete Johann Brenz, the leader of the innovations in Wartenberg. After such an emanyle he scarcely dared to raise his eyes in the presence of honourable women, seeing what an insult this was to them.*

Not to show how reprehensible was the deed, but merely to demonstrate anew how little ground there was for throwing the responsibility on the earlier ages of the Church, we may recall that the Elector, Johnan Frederick of Sexony, on first learning of the project through Bucer, expressed his "horror," and two days later informed the Landgrave through Bruck, that such a thing had been unbrard of for ages and the law of the land and the tradition of the whole of Christendom trere blowns against Amedori's "Bedraken," probably from the latter end of June, 1840, published by Rockwell, fold, p. 324.

Further details in Paulus, total, p. 562.

 Jonne, ibid., p. 397.
 P. Techackert, 'Briefwechnel des Anton Curvanus," 1900, p. 79. Paulus, (bid., p. 561

O I Sehensit, 'Justus Menius uber die Bigamie'' ("Zestacht f. d best. Theor., 38, 1865, p. 645 ff. More from it in Poulin, p. 846. Cp. Rockwell, séid., p. 126 j.

* Th. Pressel, " American Pressions," 1868, p. 210 "Communicalavit ecclesium temeratute sun ferdieseme."

fi. It is true that he allowed himself to be pacified and sent his representative to the wedding, but afterwards he again declared with disapproval, that the whole world, and all Christians without distinction, would declare the Emperor right should be interfere; he also instructed his minister at the Court of Dreaden to deny that the Elector or the Wittenberg theologians had had any hand in the matter. The Other Princes and politicisms belonging to the new faith left on record strong expressions of their disapproval; for instance: Elector Josehan II of Brandenburg, Duke Ulrich of Wurtenberg, King Christian III of Denmark, the Strasburg statesman Jacob Sturm and the Augsburg ambassador David Dettigliofer. To the latter the news "was frightful tidings from which would result great scandal, a hindrance to and a falling away from the Holy Evangel."

All there now remains to do is to illustrate, by statements made by Protestanta in earlier and more recent times, two important points connected with the Hessian episode; vis. the unhappy part which politics played in Luther's attitude, and what he said on lying. Here, again, during the last ten years there has been a movement in Luther's favour amongst many Protestant theologians.

Concerning the part of politics W. Rockwell, the historian of the bigamy, openly admits, that: "By his threat of seeking protection from the Emperor for his bigamy, Philip overcame the unwillingness of the Wittenbergers to grant the requested dispensation." "It is clear," he also says, "that political pressure was brought to bear on the Wittenbergers by the Landgrave, and that to this pressure they yielded."

That consideration for the effect his decision was likely to have on the attitude of the Landgrave weighed heavily in the balance with Luther in the matter of his "testimony," it is scarcely possible to deny, after what we have seen. "The Hessian may fall away from us" (above, p. 46), such was one of the fears which undoubtedly had something to do with his compliance. To inspire such fear was plainly the object of Philip's threat, that, should the Wittenbergers not prove amenable, he would make advances to the Emperor and the Pope, and the repeated allusions made by Luther and his friends to their dread of such a step, and of his falling away, show how his threat continued to ring in their cars."

Paulus, ibid., p. 569 f. . . * Ibid., p. 570 ff.

Fr. Roth, "Augsburgs Reformationsgesch.," 3, 1907, p. 54.
 Ibid., p. 95.
 Ibid., p. 154.
 See above, p. 18, 21 f., 46, 42 n. 2

Bucer declared he had himself agreed to the bigsiny from fear lest Phiap should otherwise be lost to the Evangencal cause, and his feelings were doubtiess shared at Wittenberg. Melanchthon speaks not merely of a possible attempt on Phil purport to obtain the Emperor's conction to his marriage, but of an actual threst to leave the party in the lurch. 1 Johann Brens, as soon as news reached him in Würtersberg of the Landgrave's hint of an appeal to the Emperor, saw in it a threat to turn his back on the protesting party 1. All three probably believed that at heart the Landgrave would remain true to the new faith, but what Lather had chiefly in view was Philips position as head of the Schmalkalden League.

The result was all the more tragic. The compliance wrung from the Wittenbergers failed to protect the party from the evil they were so desirous of warding off. Philip's reconciliation with the Emperor, as already pointed out, was very detrimental to the Schmalkalden League, however insincere his motives may have been.

On this point G. Kaweran says " "In the Landgrave's resolution to address himself to the Emperor and the Pope, of which they were informed, they [Luther and Melancithon] saw a "public scands," a "publics offensio, which they sought to obviate by demanding almolute secrety "15. * But the disastrone political consequences did, in the event, make their appearance . . . The realously promoted advance with Francoin I, to which even the Saxon Elector was not averse, come to nothing and Denmark and Sweden's overtures had to be repelled. The primemover in the Schmalkakten League was himself obliged to cripple the League. The dreaded champion of the Evangel became the tool of the Imperial policy ' (v. Bezola). From that time forward his position lacked precision and his strong sastiative was gone."

G. Ellinger, m his study on Melanchthon, writer: " It can searonly be gained that Luther and Mclanchthon allowed themselves in a moment of weakness to be influenced by the weight of these considerations." The petition, he explains, had been Kostlin-Kawerau, 2, p. 475. Cp. Kelde, "Luther," 2, p. 489, and " R.E. für prot. Theol.," 15", p. 310.

^{2 &}quot; Defectionem etiam minitaliatur, si nos consulere el nollemus" To Camerarian, Aug. 24, 1040, "Corp. ref.," 3, p. 1972. Cp. p. 863. Above, p. 42.

^{* &}quot;Hoe fere tentumdem est me et minatus evet, et ab Evengelio defecturem." Preusel, p. 211.

* Moller, " Lehro, der KG.," 3°, p. 146 f.

The secundal lay rather elsewhere. According to howerau Lather's " principal motive was his desire to save the Landgrave shouldy means of an expedient, which, though it did not correspond with the perfect idea of marriage, was not directly forbidden by God, and in certain ercumnuscen had even been permitted. The questionable nature of this advice is, however, evident," etc.

wermly arged upon the Wittenbergers from a political point of view by Bucer, the intermediary. "If Bucer showed himself favourable to the Landgrave's views this was due to his wish to preserve thereby the Evangelical cause from the loss of its most doughty champion; for Philip had told him in confidence, that, in the event of the Wittenbergers and the Saxon Electorate refusing their consent, he intended to address himself directly to the Emperor and the Pops in order to obtain sanction for his bigains." The Landgrave already, in the summer of 1534, had entertained the idea of approaching the Emperor, and in the oping of 1535 had made proposals to this end. "It can hardly be doubted that in Bucer's case political reasons turned the scale." Elanger refers both to the admission made by Melanchthon and to the significant warning against the Emperor with which the letter of Dispensation closes."

The strongest reprobation of the evil influence exerted over Luther by politics comes, however, from Adulf Hausrath.* He makes at clear, that, at Wittenberg, they were aware that Protestantians "would assume quite another aspect were the mighty Protestant leader to go over to the Pope or the Emperor"; never has "the demoral sing character of all politics" been more shamefully revealed; "eternal principles were sacrificed to the needs of the moment"; "Philip had to be retained at any cost." Hence came the "great moral defeat" and Luther's "fal.."

This indignant language on the part of the Heidelberg historian of the Church has recently been described by a learned theologian on the Protestant side as both "offenave " and uncalled for. Considering Luther's bold character it is surely very improbable, that an attempt to intimidate him would have had any effect except "to arouse his spirit of defiance"; not under the influence of mere "opportunism" did he act, but, rather, after baving, as a confessor, heard " the cry of deep distress " he sought to come to "the aid of a suffering conscience."-In answer to this we must refer the reader to what has gone before, where this view, which seems a favourite with some moderns, has already sufficiently been dealt with. It need only be added, that the learned author says of the bigamy, that " a fatal blunder" was made by Luther . . . but only because the mediaval confessor intervened. "The reformer was not able in every season and situation to assert the new religious principle which we owe to him; hence we have merely one of many instances of failure, though one that may well be termed grotesque and is searcely to be matched." "Nothing did more to hinder the triumphal progress of the Reformation than the Landgrave's 'Turkish marriage.' 'As to the argument drawn from Luther's boldness and defiance, a Protestant has pointed out, that we are not compelled to regard any compliance from motives of policy as "absolutely precluded"; to say that "political expediency played no part whatever in Luther's case "is "going a little too far." "Did then Luther never allow any room to political considerations? Even, for instance, in the question of armed resistance to the Emperor?"

⁶ "Luthers Leven," 2, p. 393 ff.

¹ "Phil, Melanchthon," pp. 376, 362.

Referring to Luther's notorious utterance on lying, G. Ellinger, the Protestant biographer of Melanchthon, says: Luther's readiness to deny what had taken place is "one of the most unpleasing episodes in his life and bears sad testimony to the frailty of human nature." His statements at the Eisenach Conference "show how even a great man was driven from the path of rectitude by the blending of politics with religion. He advised a "good, downright lie" that the world might be saved from a scandal. . . . It is sad to see a great man thus led astray, though at the same time we must remember, that, from the very start, the whole transaction had been falsified by the proposal to conceal it."

Th. Kolde says in a similar strain, in a work which is otherwise decidedly favourable to Luther, "Greater offence than that given by the 'advice' itself is given by the attitude which the reformers took up towards it at a later date."

"The most immoral part of the whole business," so Frederick von Bezoid says in his "Geschichte der deutschen Reformation," "lay in the advice given by the theologians that the world should be imposed upon. . . . A man [Luther] who once had been determined to sacrifice himself and the whole world rather than the truth, is now satisfied with a petty justification for his falling away from his own principles." And, to conclude with the most recent biographer of Luther, Adolf Hausrath thus criticises the invitation to tell a "downright he"; "It is indeed and to Phil. Melanchthon," pp. 382, 383.

Bd., 2, p. 488 f.

Page 736.

¹ O. Clernen, "Zeitschr. f. KG.," 30, 1909, p. 389 f. Cp. the views of the Protestant historians, K. Wenek, H. Vick and W. Köhler, addited by Paulus (loc. cst., p. 515), who all admit the working of political pressure.

see the position into which the ecclesisatical leaders had brought themselves, and how, with devilish logic, one false step induced them to take another which was yet worse."¹

This notwithstanding, the following opinion of a defender of Luther (1909) has not failed to find supporters in the Protestant world: "The number of those who in the reformation-period had already outgrown the lax mediaval view regarding the requirements of the love of truth was probably not very great. One man, however, towers in this respect above all his contemporaries, vis. Luther. He it was who first tought us what truthfulness really is. The Catholic Church, which repudiated his teaching, knows it not even to this day." "A truthfulness which disregards all else," nay, a "positive horror for all duplicity" is, according to this writer, the distinguishing mark of Luther's life.

¹ "Lathers Leben," 2, p. 403.

CHAPTER XXII

LUTHER AND LYING

1. A Battery of Assertions.

LUTHER'S frank admission of his readiness to make use of a "good bug he" in the complications consequent on Philip's bigamy, and his invitation to the Landgrave to escape from the dilemma in this way, may serve as a plea for the present chapter. "What harm is there," he asks, "if, in a good cause and for the sake of the Christian Churches, a man tells a good, downright lie?" "A lie of necessity, of convenience, or of excuse, all such lies are not against God and for such He will Himself answer"; "that the Landgrave was unable to he strongly, didn't matter in the least."

It is worth while ascertaining how Luther-who has so often been represented as the embodiment of German integrity and uprightness—behaved in general as regards the obligation of speaking with truth and honesty. Quite recently a Protestant author, writing with the sole object of exonerating his hero in this particular, bestowed on him the title of "Luther the Truthful." "Only in one single instance," so he has it, "did Luther advise the use of a lie of necessity at which exception might be taken." In order not to run to the opposite extreme and make mountains out of mole-hills we shall do well to bear in mind how great was the temptation, during so titanic a struggle as his, for Luther to ignore at times the rigorous demands of truth and justice, particularly when he saw his opponents occasionally making light of them. We must likewise take into consideration the vividness of Luther's imagination, the strength of the ideas which dominated him, his tendency to exaggeration and other mitigating circumstances.

The larger port on of the present chapter appeared as an article in the "Zentschr. für kath. Theol.," 29, 1905, p. 417 ff. [* See above, p. 51.

There was a time when Luther's loes were ready to describe as hes every false statement or erroneous quotation made by Luther, as though involuntary errors and mistakes due to forgetfulness were not liable to creep into his works, written as they were in great haste.

On the other hand, some of Luther's admirers are ready enough to make admissions such as the following: "In point of fact we find Luther holding opinions concerning truthfulness which are not shared by every Christian, not even by every evangelical Christian." "Luther unhesitatingly taught that there might be occasions when it was a Christian's duty to depart from the truth."

To this we must, however, add that Luther, repeatedly and with the utmost decision, urged the claims of truthfulness, branded lying as "the devil's own image," and extolled as one of the excellencies of the Germans—in which they differed from Italians and Greeks—their reputation for ever being "loyal, truthful and reliable people"; he also adds—and the words do him credit—"To my mind there is no more shameful vice on earth than lying."

This, however, does not dispense us from the duty of carefully examining the particular instances which seem to militate against the opinion here expressed.

We find Luther's relations with truth very strained even at the beginning of his career, and that, too, in the most important and momentous explanations he gave of his attitude towards the Church and the Pope. Frequently enough, by simply placing his statements side by side, striking falsehoods and evasions become apparent.⁴

For instance, according to his own statements made in private, he is determined to assail the Pope as Antichrist, yet at the same time, in his official writings, he declares any thought of hostility towards the Pope to be alien to him. It is only necessary to note the dates: On March 11, 1519, he tells his friend Spalatin that he is wading through the Papal Decretals and, in confidence, must admit his uncertainty as to whether the Pope is Antichnet or merely his Apostle, so missecably had Christ, i.e. the truth, been crucified by him in the [&]quot;Für Lather," p. 425 ff.

1V.—G

¹ W. Walther, "Theol. Lateraturblatt," 1904, No. 35. Cp. Walther, "Für Luther," p. 425 ff.

"Worke," Erl. ed., 9", p. 306.
"Ibid., 39, p. 356.

Puller proofs will be found seattered throughout our earlier volumes.

Decretals.* Indeed, even in the earlier half of Dec., 1515, he had been wondering whether the Pops was not Antichrist; on Dec. 11, writing to his friend Link, he said he had a suspicion, that the "rest Antichrist," of whom Paul speaks ruled at the Court. of Rome, and believed that he could prove that he was "even worse than the Turk "4. In a similar strain he wrote as early as Jan. 13, 1519, that he intended to fight the "Boman serpent" mould the Elector and the University of Wittenberg allow him so to do ,* on Feb. 3,4 and again on Feb. 20, 1919,1 he admitts that it had already "long" been his intention to declare war on Rome and its falufications of the truth.-In spite of all this, at the beginning of Jan., 1519, he informed the Papal agent Milite that he was quite ready to send a hamilte and asteromive letter to the Pope, and, as a motter of fact, on Jan. 5 or 5), 1510, he wrote that strange epacle to Leo X in which he speaks of lumiself as "the drops of humanity" in the presence of the Pope's "oubline majesty"; he approaches him like a "lambkin," whose bleating he begathe Vient of Christ graciously to give ear to. Nor was all this merely said in derision, but with a fixed purpose to deceive. He declares with the atmost solemnity "before God and every creature" that it had never entered his mind to assail in any way the sutherity of the Boman Church and the Pope, on the contrary, he' entirely admits that the power of the Church extends over all, and that is thing in heaven or on earth is to be perferred to her, except Jesus Christ alone, the Lord of all things.' The original letter still exists, but the letter attelf was never despatched, probably because Militz raised some objection 4. Only through more chance did the Papal Curia fan to receive this letter, which, compared with Luther's real thought as elsowhere expressed, can only be described as

In his dealings with his Bishop, Rieronymus Scultetus the chief pastor of Brandenburg, he had already displayed a like duplicity,

* "Brefwecket," 1, p. 450. * Ibid., p. 316.

 To Christoph Schemel, ibid., p. 348. To Johann Lang, 60:4, p. 410.

To Willibald Pickheimer, ibid., p. 434.

Briefwechiel, p 444 Concerning the date and the breping back of the letter, see Brieger, "Zeitschn, für KG.," 15, 1895, p. 204 f. 2 Strange to my, this document has not been taken into consideration by Q. Sodeur, in "Luther and die Luge, eine Schutzschrift" (Leipzig, 1904). In the same way other sources throwing light on Lather a attribute towards fring have been passed over. object, viz. Lather's vindication, is apparent throughout, is perhaps only natural. How for this object is attained the reader may see from a comparison of our material and results with those of the " Schutzschrift." The same holds of W. Walther's efforts on Luther's behalf in his art. "Luther and die Lage," and in his "Für Luther," Soe above, p. 81, n. 1. See also N. Paulus, "Zu Luthern Doppelzüngigkeit." (Beil, für Augsburger Postztag.," 1904, No. 33); "Mist, Jahrb.," 26, 1905, p. 188 f.; "Hist, pot. Bl.," 1805, 135, 323 fl.; "Wissenschaft!, Beil, tur Germania," 1904, Nos. 33, 35.

In May, 1816, he wrote assering him in the most respectful terms, that he submitted unconditionally to the judgment of the Church whatever he was advancing concerning laddigeness and kindred sub-sets; that the B shop was to burn all his emblies (Therm and Resolutions) should they displease him, and that he would "not mind as the seast" !— And yet a considertial letter cent these months earl or to his friend Spolution exentions, though for the benefit of him " alone and our friends," that the whole system of Indugences now seemed to Listier a " deliating of coult, good only to promote spectual latiness."

To the Emperor too he also gives assurances couched in submissive and peaceful language, which are in marked contrast with other statements which emanated from him about the come time.

It is only necessary to recall has letter of Aug. 30, 1520, to Charles V.* Here Lather earlie to convince the hasperor that he is the quietest and most doctie of theologisms. Who was " forced to tritle only owing to the marie and for in a by others "; who wished for nothing more than to be ignored and left in priore , and who was ready at any moment to welcome the instruction which an far had been refused hen - Very of florest was his angliege a fow weeks earlier when writing to Specation, his tool at the Electoral Court of Sazony "The the is cast, the despicable fury or fevour of the Remans is no hing to me; I desire no Perconstitution of communion with them. . . . I shall burn the whose of the Papal Laws and ad hums) by and freed shew shall cease."4 He even hopes, with the help of Spalatin and the Elector, to send to Rome the ammous tidings of the offer made by the Knight Silventer won Schusenburg to protect him by armed force; they might then see at Rome "that their thunders are of no avail ", should they, however, obtain from the Elector. his dismissed from his cheer at Wettouberg, then, " with the support of the men-at-arms, he would make things still warrace for the Romann." And yet, on the other hand, buther was just then ment animous that Spaintin, by means of the Elector, abould represent his engas everywhere, and particularly at Home, as not yet defined, on a point of controversy urgently calling for examination or, at the very least, for a biblioni refutation before the Empiror and the Church, the flovereign also was to tell the Romans that " violence and remures would only make the case of Germany worse even than that of Bohemia, and would lead to "arrepressible turnults." In such wise, by deat of disherest diplomacy, did he sees to frighten, as he save, the "tirnid Romanuta " and thus prevent their taking any steps against ham a

If we go back a bittle further we find a real and irreconcilable decrepancy between the actual events of the Indulgence contro-

On May 22, 1818, "Belofwestwol," 1 p. 149.

On Feb. 15, 1518, ibid., p. 155.

^{*} Brief wechaul," 2, p. 462.

4 July 10, 1520, ibid., p. 432

5 Ibid., Schauschung's letter, ibid., p. 433 versy of 1617 and 1618 and the accounts which he hancelf gave of them later.

"I was forced to accept the degree of Ductor and to swear to preach and teach my chorished Scriptures truly and faithfully. But then the Papacy barred my way and sought to prevent me from teaching "I "While I was looking for a blessing from Rome, there came instead a storm of thunder and lightning; I was made the lamb that fouled the water for the wolf; Detail meaned seat-free, but I was to be devoused."

His inhersoods about Totael are scarcely helievable. The latter was, so he says, such a criminal that be had even been condemned to denth.4

The Indulgence-preachers had declared (what they never thought of doing) "that it was not necessary to have remorae and sorrow in order to obtain the inclulgence." In his old age Luther stated that Tetral had even given Indulgences for future mas. It is true, however, that when he spoke "he had already become a myth to humself" (A. Hasarathi, "Not only are the dates wrong but even the events themselves. . . . It is the same with the statement that Tetral had sold Indulgences for sun not yet committed. . . . In Luther's charges against Tetral in the controversy on the Theses we hear nothing of this; only in the work "Wister Hans Worst" (1541), written in his old age, does he make such an assertion." In this tract Luther does indeed make Tetral teach that "there was no used of removes, corrow or repentance for an, provided one bought an indulgence, or an indulgence letter" He saids . "And he [Tetral] also sold for future sins." (See vol. f., p. 342.)

This untruth, clearly confuted as it was by facts, passed from Luther's lips to those of his chargies. Mathenius in his first sermor on Luther swine to be drawing as the passage in "Wider Hans Whest" when his says, Tetrel had preached that he was able to forgive the higgest past "as well as future size." Luther's friend, Friderick Myounus, helped to spread the same falsohood throughout Germany by umbodying it in his "Historia Reformations (1542)," whilst in fivilizationd, Henry Bullinger, who also promoted it, expressly releva to "Water Hans Worst" as his authority.*

In this way Lather's misrepresentations infected his whole circle, nor can we be surprised if in this, as in so many similar materies, the falsebook has held the field even to our own day."

"Werke," Weim ed., 10, 3, p. 386; Erl. ed., 251, p. 87
 Fluid., Erl. ed., 261, p. 72.
 Ibid., p. 70, 68 f

I bid., Weire, ed., 20, 2, p. 284, Erl. ed., 245, p. 367. On indulgeness for the departed, see our vol. 1, p. 344.

• Hawrath, "Luthern Leben," 1, 1904, p 432

Historien (1566), p. 11.
 Ed. Cyprine, p. 20.

* Reformationsgesch. von H. Bullinger," od. Hottinger in. Vögeil, 1, 1838, p. 19.

by * One such tale put in circulation by the Latherens in the 16th century has been dealt with by N. Parkus in * Gibt on Abdom for guidantings Society? (* Lat. Heil der Kein, Volunting ,* 1905, No. 43.)

We may mention incidentally, that Lather declares concerning the fame which his printed "Propositions against Tetael's Articles " brought him; " It did not please me, for, as I said, I rayself did not know what the Indulgence was," although his first sermom are a refutation, both of his own professed ignorance and of that which he also attributes " to all theologians generally." - Finally, Luther was very fond of intentionally representing the Endulgence controversy as the one source of his opposition to the Church, and in this he was so successful that many still believe it in our own times. The fact that, long before 1517, his views on Grace and Justification had alterated him from the teaching of the Church, he keeps altogether in the background.

At length the Church intervened with the Ban and Luther was summoned before the Emperor at the Dict of Worms. Three years later, at the cost of truth, he had already contrived to cast a halo of glory around his public appearance there. For instance, we know how, contrary to the true state of the case, he wrote: " I went to Worms although I knew that the safe conduct given me by the Emperor would be broken '; for the German Princes, otherwise so staunch and true, had, he says, learned nothing better from the Roman idol than to disregard their plighted word; when he entered Worms he had "taken a jump into the gaping jawn of the monster Behemoth." Yet he knew well enough that the promise of a safe conduct was to be kept most conscientiously. Only on the return journey did he express the fear lest, by preaching in defiance of the prohibition, he might make people say that he had thereby forfested his safe conduct.

Yet again it was no tribute to truth and probity, when, after the arrival in Germany of the Bull of Excommunication, though perfectly aware that it was genuine, he nevertheless feigned in print to regard it as a forgery concected by his enemies, to the detrament of the Evangel. In confidence

Here, in view of some modern misapprehensions of the so-called Confession and Induspence letters, he says. "They referred to future ame, only measured as they authorised those who obtained them to select a confessor at their own descretion for their subsequent and, and promised an includence later, provided the size committed had been bumbly confessed. In this sense even our modern includences promised for the future may be said to refer to future size."

1 "Werke," Erl. ed., 26°, p. 71.

2 To Count Sebastian Schlick, July 15, 1523, "Opp. lat. var.," 6, p. 385 ("Briefwecksel," 3, p. 433).

3 To Count Albert of Manifeld, from Emerach, May 9, 1521, "Werke," Erl. ed., 53, p. 74 ("Briefwechsel," 3, p. 144).

he declared that he "believed the Bull to be real and authentic," and yet at that very time, in his "Von den newen Eckischenn Bullea und Lugen," he brought forward four reasons for its being a forgery, and strove to make out that the document was, not the work of the Pope, but a "tissue of her " woven by Eck."

His tacties had been the same in the case of an edict directed against him by the Bishop of Meissen, the first of the German episcopate to take action. He knew very well that the enactment was genuine. Yet he wrote in reply the "Antwort auff die Tzedel sso unter des Officials tzu-Stolpen Sigel ist aussgangen," as though the writer were some unknown opponent, who . . . " had lost his wits on the Gecksberg."4

A similar artifice was made to serve his purpose in the matter of the Papal Brief of Aug. 23, 1518, in which Card nal-Caretan received full powers to proceed against him. He insisted that this was a makerous fabrication of his focs in Germany; and yet he was well aware of the facts of the case: he cannot have doubted its authenticity, seeing that the Brief had been officially transmitted to him from the Saxon Court through Spalatin. 4

While, however, accusing others of deception, even occasionally by name, as in Eck's case, he saw no wrong in antedating his letter to Leo X: for this neither he nor his adviser Militia was to be called to account; it sufficed that by dating it earlier the letter appeared to have been written. in ignorance of the Excommunication, and thereby served Luther's interests butter. 5

In fact, right through the period previous to his open breach with Rome, we see him ever labouring to postpone the decision, though a great gulf already separated mm from the Church of yore. Across the phantom bridge which still spanned the chasm, he saw with satisfaction thousands passing into his own can p. When on the very point of

"credo veram et proprium cue bultam"

1 "Werke," Weinn ed., 6, p. 102. Erl ed., 242, p. 29 ff.

2 Ibid., p. 138 = 27, p. 80, in February, 1520, Kostlin-Kawerau, 1, pp. 214, 759.

Tho letter was written after Oct. 13, 1520, but is dated Sep. 6, the Excommunication having been published on Sep. 21. Cp. Minutz to the Elector of Sexony, Oct. 14, 1 (2), in Enders, Briefwechiel Luthers," 2, p. 495, n. 3, raising the standard of revolt he seemed at pains to prove it anything but an emblem of uprightness, probity and truth.

¹ To Spalatin, (11) October 1520, "Briefwechsel," 2, p. 491:

Passing now to the struggle of his later life, similar phenomena can scarcely escape the eyes of the unprejudiced observer.

He was proposing untruth and deception when, in 1520, he advised candidates to qualify for major Orders by a fictitious vow of celibacy. Whoever was to be ordained subdeacon was to urge the Bishop not to demand continency, but should the Bishop insist upon the law and call for such a promise, then the candidates were quietly to give it with the proviso: " quantum fregilitar humana permittit"; then, says Luther, "each one is free to take these words in a negative sense, i.e. I do not yow chastity because human femilty does not allow of a man hving chastely."1

To what lengths he was prepared to go, even where members of Reformed sects were concerned, may be seen in one of his many unjust outbursts against Zwingli and Geo ampadius. Although they were suffering injustice and violence, yet he denounced them mercilessly. They were to be proclaimed "damped," even though this led to " violence being offered them "; this was the best way to make people shrink from their false doctrines. His own doctrines, on the other hand, he says, are such that not even Catholics dured to condemn them. On his return to Witten berg from the Coburg he preached, that the Papists had been forced to admit that his doctrine did not offend against a single article of the Faith. Of Carlstadt, his theological child of trouble, he asserted, that he wished to play the part of teacher of Holy Sempture though he had never in all his Life even seen the Bible, and yet all, Luther inclusive, knew that Caristadt was not so ignorant of the Bible and that he could even boast of a considerable acquaintance with Hebrew. Concerning Lather's persecution of Carlstadt, a Protestant researcher has pointed to the "ever-recurring

4 " Collog ," ad. Bindsed, 2, p. 240.

Werlen," Werm, ed., 6, p. 441 f | Erl ed., 21, p. 323 f
 Cordatus, "Tagebuch," p. 279; 'It was much better and safer to declare them damned than saved."
 "Werlen," Werm, ed., 32, 1906, p. 133, sermons here printed for the first tune

fleed of misrepresentations, suspecions, vituperation and abuse which the Reformer poured upon his opponent."1

Such being his licence of speech, what treatment could Catholics expect at his hands? One instance is to be found in the use he makes against the Catholics of a well-known passage of St. Bernard's.

St. Bernard, says Luther, had declared the religious life to be worthism and had said : "Perdite vizi " ("I have phamefully wasted my life"). The great baint of the religious life, the noticed pateon and representative of the virtues of the closeler, Luther depicts as condemning with these words the religious life in general as an abominable error, he would have him brand his eva life and his attention to his your, in an existence foreign to God which he had too into recognised as such ! By this statement, says lather, he "hung up his cowl on the nail," and proceeds to explain his meaning: " Henceforward he cared not a bit for the soul and its foolery and refused to hear any more about at ' . Thus, as Luther assures us, St. Hernard, at the scients moment of quitting this world, " made nothing " (" solvie fecti ") of his yows.

When quoting the words "Perdits vizi" Lather frequently seeks to convey an admission on the Saint's part of his having come at last to one that the religious his was a mistake, and merely led people to lorget Christ's merits, that he had at last attained the perception during sections and had laid hold on Christ's ments as his only hope 4. Even on internal grounds it is too much to assume Lather to have been in good faith, or merely guilty of a lacus of memory. That we have here to do with a distorted version of a perfectly harmless remark is proved to the historian by another passage, dating from the year 1518, where Luther himself refers quite amply and truly to the actual words employed by St. Bernard and nees in them merely an expression of humility and the admission of a pure heart, which detested the smallest of its feathers Duratic has fosk wed up the " Preditt wird " with great acumen, shown the frequent use Lather made of it and traced the words to their actual context in St. Bernard's writings. The text does not contain the faiglest condemnation of the religious life, so that Luther's measure mause of it becomes only the more an comprehensible. *

Barge " Andreas Bodenstein von Carlstadt." 2, p. 223

"Werke" Erl. ed., 47, p. 37 f

Fof, West ed., 8, p. 658; "Opp. lat. var.," 6, p. 360.

Hod p 601 - p 270
Hod , l, p. 323=1, p. 230; l, p. 534=2, p. 142
Denufe, "Luther," 12, p. 44. Denufe has shown that the passage m question occurs in the form of a prayer in St. Bernard's * Serma XX in Contien  *  P.L.,  182, ed. 867 ;  De men misera visit miserje (Desa), observe, residusem annorum mearum ; pro hie vera (annis) quos

St. Bernard is here speaking solely of his own faults and imperfections, not at all of the religious life or of the vows. Not were the words uttered on his death-bed, when face to face with eternity, but occur in a sermon presched in the full vigour of manhood and when the Saint was eagerly pursuing his monastic Again, what things were not circulated by Luther, in the stress of his warfare, concerning the history of the Popes and the Church? Here, again, some of his statements were not simply errors made in good faith, but, as has been pointed out by Protestant historians, malignous inventions going far beyond the matter contained in the sources which we know to have been at his command. The Popes "poisoned several Emperors, beheaded or otherwise betrayed others and put them to death, as became the diabolical spectre of the Papacy." The bloodthirsty Popes were desirous of "alaying the German Emperors, as Clement IV did with Conradin, the last Duke of Suabia and hereditary King of Naples, whom he caused to be publicly put to death by the sword." Of this E. Schäfer rightly says, that the historian Sabellieus, whom Luther was utilising, simply (and truly) records that: " Conradin was taken while attempting to escape and was put to death by order of Charles [of Anjou] ": Clement IV Sabellicus does not mention at all, although it is true that the Pope was a strong opponent of the Staulen house. 3

The so-called letter of St. Ulnch of Augsburg against clerical celibacy, with the account of 8000 (6000) babies' heads found in a pond belonging to St. Gregory's numbery in Rome, is admittedly one of the most impudent forgeries found in history and emanated from some foe of Gregory VII and opponent of the ancient law of celibacy. Luther brought it out as a weapon in his struggle against celibacy, and, according to Kostlin-Kawerau, most probably the Preface to the printed text published at Wittenberg in 1520.

vivendo perdidi, quia peraite vizi, cor contritum et humiliatum Deus non despicias. Dies mei sicul umbra declinaverial el preserverial sine fracts. Impossible as, at revoces, places, at recogness the cos as amortisdase extend seen." Denote points out that the sermon in question was preached about 1.36 or 1137, about aixtem years before Bernard's drath, thus certainly not in his last illumin.

1 "Werke," Ext. ed., 26", p. 249.

1 "Luther als Kirchenhatonker," Geternioh, 1897, p. 391, referring to Sabalifate "Rhamont hist Ennead" 9 S.

to Sabellieus, "Rhapsod, hist, Ennesd.," 9, 8.

came from his pen.\(^1\) The manuscript had been sent to Luther from Holland. Emser took him to task and proved the forgery, though on not very substantial grounds. Luther demurred to one of his arguments but declared that he did not build merely on a doubtful letter. In spite of this, however, the seditious and alluring fable was not only not withdrawn from circulation but actually reprinted. When Luther said later that echbecy had first been introduced in the time of St. Ulrich, he is again speaking on the authority of the supposititious letter. This letter was also worked for all it was worth by those who later took up the defence of Luther's teaching.\(^1\)

To take one single example of Luther's waywardness in speaking of Popes who were almost contemporaries: He tells us with the utmost assurance that Alexander VI had been an "unbelieving Marane." However much we may execute the memory of the Borgia Pope, still so extraordinary an assertion has never been made by any sensible historian. Alexander VI, the pretended Jewish convert and "unfidel" on the Papal throne! Who could read his heart so well as to detect an infidelity, which, needless to say, he never acknowledged? Who can credit the tale of his being a Marane?

When, in July 14, 1887, Pope Paul III issued a Bull granting an indulgence for the war against the Turks, Luther at once published it with misleading notes in which he sought to show that the Popes, instead of linking up the Christian powers against their focs, had ever done their best to promote dissensions amongst the great monarchs of Christendom.

In 1538 he sent to the press his Schmalkalden " Artickel " against the Pope and the prospective Council, adding observations of a questionable character regarding their ² Köstlin-Kawerau, I, p. 766, p. 250, n. 1. For the literature dealing with the Utrich fable, see N. Paulus, "Die Domitikaner im Karapin gegen Luther," p. 253; and particularly J. Manaderter, "Ratte the star baselines KG 27 & p. 1914.

* cp. Kunner, Zeitschr, für ith Theol., 1870, p. 302.

[&]quot;Beitrage for hayerselven KG," 6, p. 121 f.

"Up. Hattus on. Historien," p. 40, and Flactus I lyricus in his two separate editions of the letter. Flue as also incorporated the Ulrich letter in his "Catalogus testima verifates" and repeatedly referred to it in his contraversal writings. See J. Normalers article on the mendacity of a certain class of associal intensture in the 10th century, "Flactus and Flactuagements" (Zeitsehr f kath. Theol," 12, 1888, pp. 79-115, particularly p. 107 f.).

history and meaning. He certainly was exalting unduly the Articles when he declared in the Introduction, that "they have been unanimously accepted and approved by our people." It is a matter of common knowledge, that, owing to Melanchthon's machinations, they had never even been discussed. (See vol. m., p. 434.) They were nevertheless published as though they had been the official scheme drafted for presentation to the Council. Luther also put into the printed Artickel words which are not to be found in the original.1 The following excuse of his statement as to their having been accepted at Schmalkalden has been made: "It is evident, that, owing to his grave illness at Schmalkalden, he peyer learnt the exact fate of his Articles." Let who can believe, that, after his recovery, he did not make enquiries into what had become of the Articles on which he laid so much weight, or that he "never learnt" their fate, though the matter was one well known to both the Princes and the theologians? Only after his death were these Articles embodied in the official Confessions.4

Seeing that he was ready to misrepresent even the official. proceedings of his own party, we cannot be surprised if, in his controversies, he was careless about the truth where the person of an opponent was concerned. Here it is not always possible to find even a shadow of excuse behind which he can take refuge. Of Erasmus's end he had received accounts. from two quarters, both friendly to his cause, but they did not strike him as sufficiently damning. Accordingly he at once set in currency reports concerning the scholar's death. utterly at variance with what he had learnt from the letters in question. He accused the Catholics, particularly the Catholic Princes, of attempting to murder him, and frequently speaks of the hired braves sent out against him. Nor were his friends and pupils slow to take his words literally and to hurl such charges, more particularly against Duke George of Saxony. 4 Yet not a single attempt on his life can be proved, and even Protestants have admitted concerning the Duke that "nothing credible is known of any attempt on George's part to assassinate Luther."1 Cochleus merely relates that murderers had offered their services to Duke George; beyond that nothing.

² Cp. Kolde on Luther's "private print," in Moller, "Bekenntnuwhereten '10, p xxvi , n 1 Köntlin-Kawarau, 2, p. 357 f

Por proofs from Luther's correspondence, vol. xi., see the article of N Paulus in the " Lit. Beil der Köln, Volkstring," 1900, p. 226. On Erasmus, ees below, p. 93

6 "Ratzebergers Chronik," ed. Neudecker, p. 60 f.

Far more serious than such misrepresenting of individuals was the injustice he did to the whole ecclesiastical life of the Middle Ages, which he would fain have made out to have entirely falien away from the true standard of Christian faith and practice. Seen through his new glasses, medieval life was distorted beyond all recognition. Walter Köhler gives a warning which is to the point: "Protestant historians must beware of looking at the Middle Ages from Luther's standpoint." In particular was mediaval Scholasticism selected by Luther and his friends as a butt for attack and misrepresentation. Bucer admits in a letter to Bullinger how far they had gone in this respect; "We have treated all the Schoolmen in such a way as to shock many good and worthy men, who see that we have not read their works but are merely anxious to slander them out of prudence."4

However desirous we may be of crediting the later Luther with good faith in his distorted views of Catholic practices and doctrines, still be frequently goes so far in this respect as to make it extremely difficult to believe that his misrepresentations were based on mere error or actual conviction. One would have thought that he would at least have noticed the blatant contrast between his insinuations and the text of the Breviary and Missal-books with which he was thoroughly conversant—and even of the rule of his Order. As a monk and priest he was perfectly familiar with them; only at the cost of a violent wrench could he have passed from this so different theological world to think as he ultimately did of the doctrines of Dollinger was quite right when he wrote: Catholicism "As a controversalist Luther combined undeniably dialectic and thetorical talent with a degree of unscrupulousness such as is rarely met with in this domain. One of his most ordinary methods was to distort a doctrine or institution into a mere carreature of itself, and then, furgetful of Köntlin-Kawerau, 2, p. 862, p. 307, n. 1.

 Joh. Karl Seidemann, "Beitrage zur RG.," 1845 ff., p. 137.
 "Katholizzemus und Reformation," p. 45
 Letter to Bultinger, 1535, "Corp. ref.," 10, p. 138.

the fact that what he was fighting was a simple creation of his fancy, to hanch out into righteous abuse of it. . So soon as he touches a theological question, he confuses it. often of set purpose, and as for the reasons of his opponents, they are mutilated and distorted out of all recognition."1 The untruthfulness of his polemics is poculiarly apparent in his attack on free-will. It is impossible, even with the best of intentions, to put it all, or practically all, to the account " of the method of disputation " then in use. That method, the syliometre one, called for a clear and accurate statement of the opponent's standpoint. The controversy round "De serve arbstrio" (fully dealt with in vol. in, pp. 228-294) has recently been studied by two scholars, one a Protestant, the other a Catholic, and both authors on the whole agree at least on one point, viz. that Luther ascribed to his opponent a denial of the necessity of Grace, such as the latter never defended, and such as is quite unknown to Catholics.* Indeed, at a later juncture in that same controversy Luther even declared of the author of the "Hyperaspistes" that he denied the Trinity !"

Instead of instancing anew all the many minor misrepresentations of the dogmas and practices of the older Church for which Luther was responsible, and which are found scattered throughout this work, we may confine ourselves to recalling his bold assertion, that all earlier expositors had taken the passage concerning "God's justice," in Hom. i. 17, as referring to punitive justice.4 This was what

 ⁶ Luther, eine Skizze," p. 56 f.; "KL." 65, col. 342 f.
 ⁸ K. Zickendraht, Der Streit gwischen Erastum und Luther über die Willensfreiheit," Leipzig 1999, admits at least concerning some of Lathern assertance in the "De arres orbitris" that "he was led away by the was to draw wrong anforences from his opponent's premises." for instance, in asserting that Erasmus "outdid the Polagians" by reading much into Erasmin which was not there he brought chargest against him which are manifestly fame (p fil) Enthermought to against him which are granifestly fame. (p. 81) Luther sought to transposet the ared sown by Erasmus from its native soil to his own field." (p. 79; this stees of Erasmus, "were interpreted agreeably to Luther's own ways and logic." (cp. p. v.); it would not be right." amply to take for grantod that Luther's supposed allow (such as Laurentian Valia, "Do liters arbitris."; cp. "Werke." Erk. ed. 58, p. 237 ff.) in the struggle with Erasmus, ready were what he made them out to be." (p. 2)—H. Humbertclaude, "Erasmo et Luther, lour polémique our le abre arbitre," Paris, 19.0, lays stail greater stress on the injustice done to Erasmus by Luther,

1. "Werks," Wern, etc. 30, 3 p. $31; "Opp, lat. var.," 7, p. 823, Cp. Enders, "Luthers Briefwechel," 9, p. 253, m. 3, and our vol. 11, p. 398 f.

1. "Opp, lat. exeg.," 7, p. 74. Cp. our vol. 11, p. 400 f.

he taught from his professor's chair and what we find voughed for in the notes of a zealous pupil of whose fidelity there can be no question. And yet it has been proved, that, with the possible exception of Abelard, not one can be found who thus explained the passage of which Luther speaks (" hune locum"), whist Luther himself was acquanted with some at least of the more than sixty commentators who interpret it otherwise. Significant enough is the fact that he only reached this false interpretation gradually,

Luther also says that he and all the others had been told it was a mortal sin to leave their cell without their scapular. though he never attempts to prove that this was the general opinion, or was even held by anybody. The rule of his Order rejected such exaggeration. All theologisms were agreed that such trifies did not constitute a grievous sin. Luther was perfectly aware that Gerson, who was much read in the monasteries, was one of these theologians; he praised him, because, though looked at askance at Rome, he set consciences free from over-great scrupulosity and refused to brand the non-wearing of the scapular as a crime.1 Gerson was indeed not favourably regarded in Rome, but this was for other reasons, not, as Luther makes out, on account of such common-sense teaching as the above.

Then again we have the untruth he is never tired of resterating, viz. that in the older Church people thought they could be saved only by means of works, and that, through want of faith in Christ, the "Church had become a whore." A Yet ecclesiastical literature in Luther's day no less than in ours, and likewise an abundance of documents bearing on the point teach quite the contrary and make faith in Uhrist the basis of all the good works enjoined. All were aware, as Luther himself once had been, that outward works taken by themselves were worthless. And yet Luther, in one of the charges which he repeated again and again, though at the outset he cannot have believed it, says i " The question is, how we are to become pious. The Grey Friar says: Wear a grey hood, a rope and the tonsure. The Black Friar says; Put on a black frock. The Papist: Do.

<sup>Schlagenhaufen, "Aufzeichnungen," p. 41.
"Werke," Erl. ed., 58, p. 391 ("Tischreden").
Cp. e.g. the summarsed teaching of an ordinent theologian, Denis.</sup> the Cartinisian, in Krogh-Tonning, "Der letzte Scholastiker," 1904.

this or that good work, hear Mass, pray, fast, give alms, etc., and each one whatever he fancies will help him to be saved. But the Christian says. Only by faith in Christ can you become pious, and righteous and secure salvation: only through Grace alone, without any work or ments of your own. Now look and see which is true righteousness."1

Let us listen for a moment to the indignant voice of a learned Catholic contemporary, viz. the Saxon Dominican, Bartholomew Kleindienst, hunself for a while not unfavourable to the new errors, who, in 1560, replied to Luther's misrepresentations: "Some of the leaders of sects are such impudent hars as, contrary to their own conscience, to persuade the poor people to believe, that we Catholics of the present day, or as they term us Papists, do not believe what the old Papists believed; we no longer think anything of Christ, but worship the Saints, not merely as the friends of God but as gods themselves; nay, we look upon the Pope as our God; we wish to gain heaven by means of our works, without God's Grace; we do not believe in Holy Writ; have no proper Bible and should be unable to read it if we had; trust more in holy water than in the blood of Christ. . . . Numberless such-like borrible. blasphemous and hitherto unheard-of hes they invent and use against us. The instrate are well aware that this is the chief trick of the sects, whereby they render the Papacy anabomination to simple and otherwise well-disposed folk."

But had not Luther, carried away by his zeal against the Papists, taken his stand on the assumption, that, against the deception and depravity of the Papal Antichrist, every weapon was good provided only that it helped to save souls ? Such at any rate was his plea in justification of his work "An den christlichen Adel." Again, during the menacing

<sup>Worke, Ed. ed., 58, p. 391
From Kleinhenst, "Ein recht cathousch Ermaning an seine keben Teutschen," Dillingen, 1560, Paulus, "Die deutschen Bominskaner," etc., 1963, p. 276.
To Johann Lang, Aug. 18, 1530, "Briefwechsel," 2, p. 461;</sup>

[&]quot; Nos his permion sumus, popatum eme veri et germani illina Antichrists sedem, in cuius decept.onem et negentiam ob suluters unincerum nobis omnis licers arburamer." This must not be translated "to their decouving and destruction," but, "against the r trickery and makee." The passage strictly refers to his passonate work. "An don christ-lichen Adel," but seems also to be intended generally

Diet of Augsburg, when recommending the use of the questionable "Gospel-proviso," he let fall the following in a letter: Even "tricks and failings" ("doli et la peus"), should they occur amongst his followers in their resistance to the Papists, "can easily be atoned for once we have escaped the danger." He even adds: "For God's Mercy watches over us."

In the midst of the double-dealing then is progress Luther again appealed to Christ in his letter to Wenceslaus Link on Sep. 20, 1580, where he says: Christ " would be well pleased with such deceit and would scornfully cheat the [Papist] deceivers, as he hoped," i.e. raise false hopes that the Lutherans would yield: later they would find out their mistake, and that they had been fooled. Here is my view of the matter, he continues, "I am secure, that without my consent, their consent (the concessions of Melanchthon and his friends at the Diet) is invalid. Even were I too to agree with these blasphemers, murderers and faithless monsters, yet the Church and [above all] the teaching of the Gospel would not consent." This was his "Gospelproviso," thanks to which all the concessions, doctrinal or moral, however solemnly granted by him or by his followers, might be declared invalid-" once we have escaped the danger." (See vol. iii., p. $37 ff.)

The underhandedness which he advocated in order that the people might not be made aware of the abrogation of the Mass, has been considered above (vol. ii., p. 821). Another strange trick on his part—likewise for the better furtherance of his cause—was his attempt to persuade the Bishop of Samland, George von Polenz, who had fallen away from the Church and joined him, " to proceed with caution ",

To Melanchthors, Aug. 28, 1530, "Briefwechiel," 8, p. 235. Op vol. ii., p. 386. Lather anys. "violog et lapana nostres facele emendation in that he is speaking meroly of the responsibility. The exprenation that he is speaking meroly of the responsibility. The exprenation that he is speaking meroly of the responsibility. The exprenation right make, and simply would "to contale and sympathiae with him?" is too far-fetched to be true. In his edition of the "Briefwechiel?" Enders has struck out the word "mendacia" after "dolos," though writigly as weaked see is vol. it waxys. 4. According to Enders the handwriting is too faint for it to be accepted as greaned. As there is no original of the letter the question remains how it came into the old copes which were in Lutheran hands. It any case, such an interpellation would be more difficult to inderstand that its removal. It p also Lather a own instruction of such meadacia in 15.4 and 1328, given below on p. 109 ff.

"therefore that it would be useful for him [the Bishop] to appear to suspend his judgment ("ut relut suspendent sententiam apparent"); to wait until the people had consented, and then throw in his weight as though he had been conquered by their arguments." Couched in Luther's ordinary language this would mean that the Bishop was to pretend to be wavering between Christ and Antichrist, between hell and the Evangel, though any such wavering, to say nothing of any actual yielding, would have been a capital crime against religion. At the best the Bishop could only hypocritically feight to be wavering in spite of the other public steps he had taken in Luther's favour and of which the latter was well aware.

Later, in 1545, considering the "deception and depravity" of the Papacy Luther thought himself justified in insulating in a writing against the Catholic Duke Henry of Brunswick, then a prisoner, that the Pope had furnished him supplies for his unfortunate warlike enterprise against the allies of the evangelical confession.

Of this there was not the shadow of a proof. The contrary m clear from Protestant documents and protocols.* The Court of the Saxon Electorate, where an insult to the Emperor was apprehended, was aghast at Luther's resolve to publish the charge concerning the "equipment from Italy," and Chancellor Bruck hastened to request him to alter the proofs for fear of evil consequences. Luther, however, was in no mood to yield, the writing comprising this malicious mainuation and other false hoods was even addressed in the form of a letter to the Saxon. Elector and the allied Princes. At the same time the author, both in the text and in his correspondence, gave the impression that the writing had been composed without the Elector's knowledge and only at the request of "many others, some of them great mon," though in reality, as Protestants admit, the "work had been written to order," viz. at the instigation of the Electoral Court.

"We all know," Luther says, seemingly with the utmost gravity, in this work against the Duke, "that Pope and Papiets desire our death, body and soul. We, on the other hand, desire

IV. X

Google

^{*} To the apostate Franciscan Johann Bricsmann, July 4, 1524, "Briefwichsel," 4, p. 360. These instructions to the preacher who was to work for the apostany of the Teutome Order in Prussis are characteristic of Luther's diplomacy. Cp. the directions to Martin Weier (above, vol. ii., p. 323).

* "Briefe," 6, p. 386 ff.

^{*} Cp. v. Druffel in the "SB. der bayer. Akad., plul-hist. Kl.," 2, 1888, and "Forschungen zur geutschen Gesch.," 25, p. 71.

* Kastha-Kasserau, L. n. 693, p. 612, n. l. Ibid., p. 612.

to save them with us, soul and body "1. There is no need to waste words on the intentions here ascribed to the Papets. As to Luther's own good intertions so far as the material welfare of the Papists goes, what he says does not tally with the wish he so loudly expressed at that very time for the bloody destruction of the Pope. Further, as regards the Papasts' souls, what he said of his great apponent, Archbishop Albert of Mayonce, deserves to be mentioned: " He died impensent in his sins and must be damaed eternally, else the Christian faith is all wrong "3. Did Luther perhaps write this with a heavy heart? Yet he also condemns in advance the soul of the unhappy Duke of Brusewick, "seeing there is no hope of his amendment," and " even though he should feign to repent and become more pious," yet he would not be trusted made "he might pretend to repent and amend merely in order to clumb back to honour, lands and people. which assuredly would be nothing but a false and foxy reportonce " Hence he insets upon the Princes refusing to release the Duke. But even his ewn friends will not consider his religious motives for this very profound or genuine, for instance, when he mys. Were he to be relessed, "many pious hearts would be anddened and their prayers for your Serene Highnesses become teptd and cold."4. His political reasons were no less founded on untrath. The only object of the League of the Catholic Princes was to seep upon the property of the evangelical Princes . " they were thinking, not of the Christian faith, but of the lands of the Elector and the Landgrave"; they have made "one league after the other" and new, "call it a defensive one, as though forsooth they were in danger," whereas " we for our part have without intermission prayed, implored, called and cried for peace." a While Luther was himself playing fast and loose with truth, he was not slow to necuse his opponents of lying even when they presented matters as they really were. When Eck published the Bull of Excommunication, which Luther himself knew to be authentic, he was roundly rated for mying that his "tissue of her" was "the Pope's work." In fact, in all and everything that Catholics undertake against his cause, they are seeking "to deceive us and the common people, though well aware of the contrary. . . . You see how they seek the truth . . . They are raseals incarnate." In fighting against the lies of his opponents Luther, once, eurously enough in his writing "Widder die hymel schen Propheten" actually takes the Pope under his protection against the calumnies of his Wittenberg opponent Carlstadt; seeking to brand him as a liar, he declares that he "was notoriously telling lies of the Pope."

We already know how much Carlstadt had to complain of Luther's lying and fickleness.

This leads to a short review of the remarks made by Luther's then opponents and friends concerning his want of truthfulness.

S. Opinions of Contemporaries in either Camp

Luther's work against Duke Heary of Brunswick entitled "Wider Hans Worst" was so erammed with malice and falsehoods that even some of Luther's followers were disposed to complain of its unseemliness. Simon Wikle, who was then studying medicine at Wittenberg, wrote on April 8, 1541, when forwarding to his uncle the Town Clerk, Stephen Roth of Zwickau, a copy of the booklet which had just appeared: "I am sending you a little work of Dr. Martin against the Duke of Brunswick which bristles with calumnics, but which also [so he says] contains much that is good, and may be productive of something amongst the virtuous."

Statements adverse to Luther's truthfulness emanating from the Protestant side are not rure; particularly are they met with in the case of theologians who had had to suffer from his violence; nor can their complaints be entirely disallowed simply because they came from men who were in conflict with him, though the circumstance would call for caution in making use of them were the complaints not otherwise corroborated.

Œcolampadius in his letter to Zwingli of April 20, 1525, calls Luther a "master in calumny, and prince of sophists."

The Strasburg preachers Bucer and Capito, though reputed for their comparative moderation, wrote of one of Luther's works on the Sacrament, that "never had anything more sophistical and calumnious seen the light."

¹ G. Buchwald, "Simon Wilde" ("Mitt. der deutschen Gesellschaft zur Erforschung vaterland, Sprache und Astertume in Leipzig," 2, 1894, p. 61 ff.), p. 95. "hibitum columnus refertenman"

^{9, 1894,} p. 61 fl.), p. 95. "Thirlium calumnus refertionmum"

2 " Zwinglis Opp.," 8, p. 165. "cassiminated inagister et sophistarium princeps."

^{*} Letter to J. Vedam, April 14, 1528. 'Die Vedameche Bracksammlung," 4, p. 101. "Matt. zur voterl. Gesch. von St. Gallen," 28, 1902.

Thomas Munner repeatedly calls his enemy Luther "Dr. Lier " and " Dr. Lyinghps," on account of the unkindness of his polernics; more picturesquely he has it on one pecasion, that "he lied from the bottom of his guillet."

Bucer complains in terms of strong disapprobation, that, when engaged with his feet, Luther was went to inserspresent and distort their dectrines in order the more readily to gain the upper hand, at least in the estimation of the multitude. He finds that "in many places" he has "rendered the dictrines and arguments of the opposite side with manifest untruth." for which the critic is sorry, since this "gave rise to grave doubts and temptations" amongst those who detected this practice, and diminished their respect for the Evangelical teaching !

The Latheran, Hieronymus Pappus, acading Luthers work "Widor Hans Worst ' to Josephia Vachan, declared.

calumny he does not seem to me to have his equal."*

Johann Agrarola, once Luther's Irrend, and thea, on account of his Antinomianism, his adversary, brings against Luther various charges in his Notes (see above, vol. ut., p. 278); the worst refer to his "lying". God will punish Littler, he writen, referring to his work "Against the Antinomians"; "he has heaped too many her on me before all the world." Lather had eard that Agricula denied the necessity of prayer or grand works , this the latter, appealing to his witnesses, branch as an " abominable he. " He characterses the whole tract as "full of bea, " and, in point of fact, there is no doubt it did contain the worst oraggerations.

Among the writers of the opposite camp the first place is due to Ernemus. Of one of the many distortions of his meaning comnatted by Luther he says. " It is true I never look for moderation in Luther, but for so makesom a calumity I was certainly not prepared." Elementers he flarge in his face the threat; "I shall show everybody what a master you are in the art of misrepresentation, defamation, calumny and exaggeration. But the world knows this already. . . . In your sly way you contrive to tweet even what is absolutely true, whenever it is to your

* "Naudrucko doutecher Literaturwerko," Hft. 118, 1803, pp. 19. 29, etc.

 Cp. Manger in Enders. "Lathers Briefwechsel," 4, p. 274, p. 6. Heid., p. 273, n. 1, "the mendacious Lather."

4, p. 274, p. 8.

5 "Veryleichung D. Luthors and semes Gegenteries vom Abendmanl Christi." 1528, p. 23.

Vadianische Briefsammlung." 6, p. 16 (" Mitt. s. v. G. v. S.G."), 30, I 1901). Paripus earle the beak. Abress famousement plauste et curres conveterues. Mesercer huma fam felicineus ingents, qued tantio or immuseet and has set profects, at each tither we to reside et docenda secundabiles, an mela core quouse redeter columnsaride ron parem helves " Letter of April 13, 1841. Pappus was Burgomaster of interest to do so. You know how to turn black into white and to make light out of darkness. '5 Disgusted with Luther's methods, he finally became quite rangued even to worse things. He writes i "I have received Luther a letter; it is simply the work of a maximan. He is not in the least ashamed of his infamous lies and promises to do even worse. What can those people be thinking of who confide their souls and their earthly destiny to a man who allows luruself to be thus carned away by passion?"

E. Thiele, "Theol. Stud. und Krit.," 1807, p. 265 f.

6 " Eq., 14, 18; " Opp.," 3, col. 1056.

The polerus, Franz Arnolds, tells Luther, that one of his works contains " no many box no words."

Johann Detemberger hisewise says, referring to a newly sublished book of Luther's which he had been studying: " He is the most mendacious man under the sky."*

Paul Backmann, shortly after the appearance of Luther's booklet "Von der Winckelmeus," in his comments on it emits the indignant remark : " Luther's lies are tal er even than Mount Olympus."

"This is no more eveng man," Backmann also writes of Lather, "but the wicked devil humself to whom no lie, deception or falsehood is too much."

Johann Eck same up his opinion of Luther's truthfulness in these words. " He is a man who amply bristles with her (Aone totue mendacus scatene "1". The Irgeletadt theologian, like Bartholomew Kleendsenst (above, p. 95), was particularly struck by Luther's perody of Catholic doctrine.—Willibeld Pirkheimer's words in 1528 we already know.*

We pass over similar unkindly epithete hurled at here by indigment Catholic clories, secular, or regular. The latter, particularly, speaking with full knowledge and therefore all the more indignantly, describe as it deserves what he says of your, as a glaring he, of the falsehood of which Luther, the quondam monk, must have been fully aware.

Of the Catholic Princes who were capable of forming an epizion, Duke George of Saxony with his downright language must be mentioned first. In connection with the Pack regotietions he says that Luther is the "most cold-blooded line he had ever come across." "We must say and write of him, that the apostate monk has like a desperate, dishonourable and for-aworn miscreaut." "We have yet to learn from Holy Scripture that Christ ever bestowed the mission of an Apostle on such an

h 44 Hypernopiates, 11 1, 2, col. 1043

5 "Lobgesang auff des Luthers Winchelmesse," Leiptig, 1634. Bl.

E 2 The author was Abbot of Altselle.

Letter to George Agrecole, in Buchwald. "Zestache für kirchl.
 Winnerschaft und kirchl Leben," 5. Leipzig 1884, p. 56.
 Antwort auf des Büchlein, "1631. "Werke," Erl. ed., 251 p. 89.

^{4 &}quot; De votis monsstreis," 1, 2, Colon., 1524, Bl. 8 5': " Omanum тепанськовник, ды выб сегдо відині, дотинит.

^{• &}quot;Em Manlatreich dem lutherischen uprahaften, weit aufges-erten Rachen," Dreuden, 1534.

* See above, vol. 1..., p. 147

porrton Hachen," Dreuden, 1534.

* See above, vol. u., p. 147

A. 162 LUTHER THE REFORMER

open and deliberate har or sent him to proclaim the Gospel." Elsewhere he reminds Luther of our Lord's words: "By their fruits you shall know them?: To judge of the spirit from the fruits, Luther's spirit must be a "spirit of lying"; indeed, Luther proved himself "possessed of the spirit of lice."

3. The Psychological Problem Solf-suggestion and Scriptural Grounds of Exense

Not merely isolated statements, but whole series of regularly recurring assertions in Lather's works, constitute a real problem, and, matead of challenging refutation make one ask how their author could possibly have come to utter and make such things his own.

A Curious Mania.

He never three of telling the public, or friends and supporters within his own circle, that "not one dishop amongst the Papieta reads or studies Holy Scripture"; "never had he [Luther] whilst a Catholic heard anything of the Ten Commandments"; in Rome they say: "Let us be cheerful, the Judgment Day will never come"; they also call anyone who believes in revelation a "poor simpleton"; from the highest to the lowest they believe that "there is no God, so hell and no life after this life"; when taking the religious yours the Papieta also yourd they "had no need of the Blood and Passion of Christ"; I, too, "was compelled to you this"—all religious took their yours "with a blasphernous conscience."

He says: In the Papacy "they did not preach Christ," but only the Mass and good works; and further; "No Pather [of the Church] ever preached Christ", and again. "They knew nothing of the belief that Christ died for us"; or: "No ose [in Papery] ever prayed", and: Christ was locked upon only as a "Judge" and we "merely fled from the writh of God, knowing nothing of His mercy. "The Papieta." he declares, "condemned marriage as forbidden by God," and "I rayseif, while still a monk, was of the same opinion, via that the married state was a reprobate state."

In the Papacy, so Lather says in so many words, "people sought to be saved through Aristotle." "In the Papacy the parents did not provide for their children. They believed that only monks and priests could be saved "* "In the Papacy you will hardly meet with an honest man who lives up to his calling " (i.e. who performs his duties as a married man)."

- Letter of George, in Hortleder, "You den Umachen des deutschen Krieges Karin V." pp. 504, 806. Demite, 12, p. 126, n. 3.
 Yol. ii., p. 395 f.
 - * Vol. H., p. 395 f.
 * "Wetke," Werm, sd., 27, p. 286.
 * Ibul., p. 86.
- * Ibid., p. 210. The last three passages are from armone preached by Luther at Wittenberg in 1525 when along duty for Jagenhagen

Google

But enough of such extravagant assertions, which to Catholics stand self-condensed, but were intended by their author to be taken literally. He flung such wild sayings broadcast among the masses, until it became a second nature with him. For we must bear in mind that grotesque and vizulent misstatements such as the above occur not merely now and again, but samply feem in his books, sermons and conversations. It would be an endless task to enumerate his deliberate falschoods. He declares, for instance, that the Papists, in all their collects and prayers, extolled merely the ments of the Saints: yet this aspersion which he saw fit to east upon the Church in the interests of his polemics, he we I knew to be false, having been familiar from his monastic days with another and better aspect of the prayers he here reviles. He knew that the merits of the Saints were referred to only in some of the collects; he knew, moreover, why they were mentioned there, and that they were never alleged alone but always in subordination to the merits and the mediation of our Saviour (" Per Dominum nortrum Iesum Christian," etc.).

A favourite allegation of Luther's, viz. that the Church of the post had regarded Christ exclusively as a stem Judge, was crushingly confuted in Denide's work. The importance of this builtiant and scholarly refutation lies in the fact, that it is principally founded on texts and usages of the older Church with which Luther was perfectly familiar, which, for instance, he himself had recited in the liturgy and more especially in the Office of his Order year after year, and which thus bear striking testimony against his good faith in the matter of his monstrous charge.¹

It is a matter of common knowledge that, also in other branches of the history of theology and ecclesiastical life, Denific has refuted with rare learning, though with too sharp a pen, Luther's paradoxical "lies" concerning medieval Catholicism. It is to be hoped that this may be followed by other well-grounded and impartial comments from the pen of other writers, for, in spite of their monstrous

Protestant controversialists who plead that Lather at least described correctly the popular notions of Cat solice. The popular verks then in the handbooks and sermous for the instruction of the people, prayer-books, booklets for use in trials and at the hour of death, etc., give a picture of the then popular picty, and the best refursion of Lather a statements.

character, some of Luther's accusations still live, partly no doubt owing to the respect in which he is held. Some of them will be examined more closely below. The principal aim of these pages is, however, to seek the psychological explanation of the strange peculiarity which manifests itself in Luther's intellectual life, viz. the abnormal tendency to level far-fetched charges, sometimes bordering on the insune.

An Attempt at a Psychological Explanation.

A key to some of these dishonest exaggerations is to be found in the need which Lather experienced of arming himself against the Papacy and the older Church by ever more extravagant assertions. Realising how unjust and untenable much of his position was, and oppressed by those doubts to which he often confessed, a man of his temper was sorely tempted to have recourse to the expedient of insisting yet more obstinately on his pet ideas. The defiance which was characteristic of him led him to pile up one assertion on the other which his rhetorical talent enabled him to clothe in his wonted language. Throughout he was acting on impulse rather than from reflection.

To this must be added-incredible as it may appear in connection with the gravest questions of life his tendency to make fun. Jest, irony, sarcasm were so natural to him as to obtrude themselves almost unconsciously whenever he had to do with opponents whom he wished to crush and on whom he wished to impose by a show of merriment which should display the strength of his position and his comfortable sense of security, and at the same time duly impress his own followers. Those who looked beneath the surface, however, must often have rejoiced to see Luther so often blunting the point of his hyperboles by the drolleries by which he accompanies them, which made it evident that he was not speaking seriously. To-day, too, it would be wrong to take all he says as spoken in dead carnest; at the same time it is often impossible to determine where exactly the serious ends and the trivial, valgar jest begins; probably even Luther himself did not always know. A few further examples may be given.

"In Popery we were compelled to listen to the devil and to worship things that some monk had spewed or excreted, unt I at last we lost the Cospel, Baptam, the Sacrament and everything elea. After that we made tracks for Reces or for St. James of Composteda and did everything the Populi vermin told us to do, until we canno to minus even their lace and floor, may, their very heroches. But now God has returned to us."4

" hverywhere there provided the horad, particulal teaching of the Pope and the services, was that a man must be uncertain of God's grace towards historif (sacertion debere seet de grund Her even as 't' ! By this discipline and by their holiness by works Pops and muchs " had driver all the world handlong into bell " for " well such four hundred years". Of course, " for a men to be passe, or to become as by tooks Grace, was hereby " to them ; "their works were of greater value, did and wrought some their God a Grace, "* and with all this " they do no single work which might profit their neighbour in body, goods, honour or noul. *

A. Kaltheff* remarks of master distortions of which Luther ⁸ "Westo," Erl. ed., 5¹, p. 378.

Cp. "Comment, in Gal.," 2, p. 178. "Opp. let, eveg.," 16, p. 107 sec. Kostin, "Luthers Theol.," 2", p. 218.

Werke," Erl. ed., 72, p. 255. * Hed.

Fed., p. 256. "The Pope a tracking and all the books and writings of his thirologians and decretaints did nothing but posite Christ and Ha Baptain so that no one was a in to was wer it consts the hannelf trerweith", this he knew, having been himself triese years a much. Had, 19°, p. 152 in a sermin of 1825. On Huly Haptises.

kien in the human disputations of his Wittenberg public is militamortisms are found. The Papota have ever taught that the powers of man after the Fall still terms not unimposed (" adductive peace...) and that therefore he could fulfil the whole him the triven no letter shall those of the Turks and Jesus had been not up. I now serve up ad a section Judese," etc.). "Disputationes," ed. Drews, p. 340.

And to Lather pen on door to the last service he preached at Resistors past before his death. The Propo destroyed disposes nest only influencias, Londonno, atc., in this Church (2004, 20° E, p. 536 . 1 db pursuit frombs. had usually been the moret leaderers. (p. 843), the mount and done not may for notice but there is judden thermotives m their seds " (p. 542) — the monda think if they been their bads they are ventable smata" (p. 532),

In his accounts as against the respons life we find him renking Matermenta which, firsts for over former as presence, be much bare knows to be taken. But trustance, which he says, that, in their hypermissial housens, they had a guested it is a mornional to leave their cell with 016 the propolar (" Works, Ar. ed. 64, p. 34r., 34 p. 201s; 99, p. 2.0). Execute process convincingly (*, p. 54) that as trivile nero well aware that each cast man, prescribed by the County is some, nero 201 binding under air, but merely exposes franceission to punishmonthly their approva - Latter and frequently distanced, that in the Mann every translation in the recemension was to local upon in a more at PRI. even the emission of an "enim" or an incress. In the Cabin 100 d. 34, p. 60), and thus the moreover use of the irrepresely represent sum of the error had caused such apportunation that they were programd beyond recovery with the Mann. (1964, 500 p. 94). And yet his own words 4. Merso. Mesia ad the p. Jole, abit is no use aware that each Involuntary mutakes were see see cus cases queryeas surfusts procedum farme was gulky: " Hardly anyone in the whole of history was so lettle abie to bear contradiction as Luther, it was out of the question to discuss with him any opinion from another point of view ; he preferred to contradict himself or to assert what was shoolutely monetrous, rather than allow his apponent even a semblance of being in the right,"-The more resentation of Catholic doctrine which became a tradition among Lutherun polemers was an great part due to Luther -With rough shall and moderation Duke Anton Urich of Brunswick, in his "Fifty Remmon " for ceturning to the Catholic Church," protests against this pervision of Casholie doctrine by Latherna senters. He had observed that arguments were adduced by the Lutherans to prove truths which the Church done not deay at all, whilst the real position at some were barely touched upon. . * For metaror, they bring forward a heap of texts to prove that God alone is to be actored, though t athones never question it, and they teach that it is a sin of idolatry to pay divine worship to any creature." "They extal the ments of Christ and the greatness of His introfection for our aims. But what for ? Catholica teach the same, vis. that the merits of Christ are infinite and that His enterfaction suffices to blot out all the asse of the world, and thus they, too, hold the Bible ductrims of the appropriation of Christ a moreto by means of their own good works (1 Peter i. 10).

* Due Zastalter der Reformation," Jena, 1997, p. 221

Two things especially were made the butt of Luther a extravagant and untrue charges and insensations, viz. the Mass and the religious life. In his much read Table Talk the charter on the Mam in (a)) of missepresentations such as can be explained only by the names of the overher. Of religious he can relate the most incredible tales. Thus "On the approach of death most of them erred in after despute. Wretched non-that I am, I have not kept my Rule and writher shall I fee from the anger of the Judge 7. Also, that I was not a sow-herd, or the meanest creature on earth ! "* On account of the moral corruption of the Religious Orders, he declares it would be right, "were it only feasible, to destroy both Papacy and monastenes at one blow! ". He m fund of jesting at the expense of the numer than he makes a vulger allumon to their supposed practice of taking an image of the Crucifed to lesk with them, as though it were their bridegrown. He toundly charges them all with arrogance: " The num are particularly reprehensible on account of their pride; for they boast: Christ is our bridegroom and we are His brides and other women are nothing."*

"Cinquarte raisons," Munich, 1736, 29, p. 37. Above, vol. id., p. 273, n. 2.
 Werke, "Erl. ed., 60, p. 366 ff.

Op. shall, 31 p. 279.

"Works," Erl ed., 52, p. 430 f.: "Yet how few can ever have had such a thought, much less expressed it? I benife bloom, 114, p. 774. Speaking of this passage, Dentile rightly semants. I have frequently pairted out that it was Luther a tartied to represent which distributes as typical of all the rest," Here again Dentile might have quoted Luther against Lether, as indeed he often does. In one passage

It is putting the matter rather too mildly when a Protestant historian, referring to the courtless assertions of this nature, remarks, "that, in view of his habits and temper, some of Luther's highly flavoured statements call for the use of the blue pencil if they are to be accorded historical value."11

Lastly, we must point to another psychological, or, more accurately, pathological, element which may avail to explain falsehoods so glaring concerning the Church of former times. Experience teaches, that sometimes a mansoaked in prejudice will calumniate or otherwise assail a foe, at first from an evil motive and with deliberate injustice, and then, become gradually persuaded, thanks to the habit thus formed, of the truth of his calumnies and of the justice of his proceedings. Instances of such a thing are not seldom met with in history, especially among those engaged in mighty conflicts in the arena of the world. Injustice and falsehood, not indeed entirely, but with regard to the matter in hand, are travestied, become matters of indifference, or are even transformed in their eyes into justice and truth.

In Luther's case the phenomenon in question assumes a pathological guise. We cannot but perceive in him a kind of self-suggestion by which he imposed upon himself Constituted as he was, such suggestion was possible, nay probable, and was furthermore abetted by his nervous excitement, the result of his never-ceasing struggle.

It is in part to his power of suggestion that must also be attributed his success in making his disciples and followers. accept even his most extravagent views and become in their turn missioners of the same.

^{(&}quot;Werke," Erl. ed., 17t, p. 412) Luther points out quite correctly, that to make all or even a class responsible for the faults of a few is to be guilty of injustice.

Theol. Stud. und Krit.," 1908, p. 560.
 "There are passionate natures gifted with a strong imagination. who gradually, and sometimes even supplify, come to take in good faith that for true, which their own spirit of contradiction, or the desire to varideate themselves and to gain the day, magnets. Such a one was Lather, , , , It was possible for him to persuade himself of things which he had once regarded in quite a different light." This Alb. M. Weiss, "Luther " 1", p. 424. Ad Houseath rightly character. tees much of what Luther says that he had learnt of Home on his trap thither, as the "product of a self-deception which is reads y understood" ("Luthers Leben," 1, p. 79). "During a quarrel," aptly remarks Féncion "the imagination becomes heated and a man deceives humself."

Another explanation, this time a theological one, of Luther's disregard for the laws of truth is to be found in the theory he set up of the permissibility of lies.

Previously, even in 1517, he, like all theologians, had regarded every kind of he as forbidden. Theologians of earlier times, when dealing with this subject, usually agreed with Augustine and Peter Lombard, the "Magister Sententiseum," and likewise with Gratian, that all hes, even hes of excuse, are forbidden. After the commencement of his public controversy, however, strange as it may appear, Luther gradually came to assert in so many words that hes of excuse, of convenience, or of necessity were not reprehensible, but often good and to be counselled. How far this view concerning the lawfulness of lying might be carried, remained, however, a question to be decided by each one individually.

Formerly he had rightly declared - A lie is " contrary to man's nature and the greatest enemy of human society "; hence no greater should could be offered than to call a man a kar. To this he always adhered. But besides, following St. Augustine, he had distinguished between her of jest and of necessity and her of detraction. Not morely the latter, so he declared, were unlawful, but, as Augustine taught, even her of necessity or excuse—by which he understands her told for our own or others indvantage, but without injury to anyone. "Yet a lie of necessity," he said at that time, "in not a mortal an," especially when tool in sudden exestement "and without actual deliberation." This is his language in January, 1617,4 m his flermons on the Ten Commandments, when explaining the eighth. Again, in his controversy with the Zwinglians on the Secrement (1929), he meidentally shows his attitude by the remark, that, " when anyone has been publicly convicted of famehead in one particular we are thereby nishi iently warned by God not to be seve hum at all ' 4. In 1734, he says of the Pope and the Especia, that, on account of their less the words of Chesser rue applied to them a "If you are a line you he even in speaking the truth."

Meanwhile, however, his peruliar reading of the Old Testament, and possibly no less the urgent demands of his controversy, had exerted an unfortunate influence on his opinion concerning bei of convenience or necessity.

^{1 &}quot;Werke," Weins, ed., 1, p. 5.0 f; "Opp. lat., exeg.," 12, p. 200 eve.

^{*} In his "Yom Abendmal Christi Bekentnia" ("Werke," Weim od, 26, p. 241 ff., Erk od., 30, p. 152 ff.), he frequently asserts the principle. "Si mention, choic quod terms diese mentions." "Werke," Extent, 257, p. 214 in "Eties aus den hohen Artikeln des Beputhehen Glaubens genant Donatio Constanting."

It seems to him that in cortain Old Testament instances of much has those who employed them were not to blame. Abraham's he in denying that Barah was his wife, the lie of the Egyptian midwives about the Jewish children, Michol's Ito told to save David, account to Lather partitioble, seeful and wholesome. On Oct 2, 1524, in his Sermons on Exedus, as it would seem for the first time, he defended his new theory. Lies were only real lies "when told for the purpose of injuring our neighbour"; but, "if I tell a las, not in order to injure anyone but for his profit and advantage and in order to promote his best interests, this is a he of service", such was the he told by the Egyptain midwives and by Abraham , such his fall " under the grace of Heaven, i.e. came under the forgiveness of airs 1, such falseheads "are not really lies."

In his lectures on Concum (1630–45) the name system has been further elaborated: " As a matter of fact there is only one had of he, that which injures our neighbour in his soul, goods or reputation." "The he of service is wrongly termed a be, for it rather denotes virtue, was prudence used for the purpose of defeating the devil a malice and in order to serve our neighbour a his and honour. Hence it may be called thrustian and protherly charity, or to use Paul's words: Zeal for godhness ". Thus Abraham " told no lip" in Egypt (Jon. 231-11 ff); what he told was " a lie of service, a penasoworthy act of produces, '*

According to his Latin Table Talk not only Abraham's he, hat also Markel's was a "good, useful to and a work of charity "! A he for the advantage of another is, as he says, as act. 1 by means of which we cariot our neighbour."

"The monks, ' easys Luther, " inset that the truth should be told under all excusateness.' "-Such cortain, y was the teaching of St. Thomas of Ayure, whose opinion on the subject then held universal away, and who rightly meets that a lie is never under any areameterious laurici. F. St. Augustino likewise shared this monimic opinion, in Lather himself had formerly pointed out. Long before Aquanase tame this Ductor of the Church, whom Luther was later on debberately to oppose," had brought his view—the only reliable one, vis. that all untruth is wrong—into general recognition, thanks to his arguments and to the weight of his authority. Pope Alexander III, in a letter to the Arch-in vindomsion of the Egypton midwives was not merely added later.

⁶ Works, T. Weirs, ed., ¹6, p. 18; Fel. ed. 36 p. 18. The passage.

* "Opp. Int. useg." S, p. 18.

* Thid., 3, p. 139 erg.

* Lolling " ed Birchwel, 1 p 420 Cp Lauterbach Tagebuch." p. 16 : " Mennes at factors di-Forsist, nare mondacism est fatoriae com- Opp. lat. eneg., b, p. 286.

bishop of Palermo, declared that even a lie told to save another's life was unlawful; the statement was incorporated in the official Decretals—a proof of the respect with which the mediaval Church clung to the truth.

Some few writers of antiquity had, it is true, defended the lawfulness of less of necessity or convenience. For instance, Origen, possibly under the influence of pages philosophy, also Hilary and Cassian. Eventually their opinion disappeared almost completely.

It was reserved for Luther to revive the wrong view concerning the lawfulness of such lies, and to a certain extent to impose it on his followers. Theologically this spelt retrogression and a lowering of the standard of morality hitherto upheld. "Luther here forsook his beloved Augustine," says Stäudlin, a Protestant, "and declared certain lies to be right and allowable. This opinion, though not universally accepted in the Evangelical Church, became nevertheless a dominant one."

Luther's "truthfulness" has attempted to prove of Alexander III, that "the objectivity of good was foreign to him," and that he taught that the end justifies the means. As K. Hempe has pointed out in the "Hot Zeitechr." 93 1904, p. 415, the letter from the Pope to Thomas Becket ("P.L.," 200, col. 200), here referred to, has been "quite manufectiond." The same is the ease with a letter of Gregory VII to Alphonous of Castile, which has also been alleged to show that a Pope 'had not unconditionally rejected lying, may, had over made use of it." Gregory on the centrary declares that even "a be teld for a pieus object and for the sales of peace." was a sin ("Mad perceius case apa dishisverie, in secendatibus quaei secrilegium centroise." "P.L.," 148, col. 804). Cp. Hampe, ibut p. 383 fl.; N. Paulin, "Lit. Heilage dec Köln. Volkesting.," 1904, No. 61

³ ¹⁴ N. Lehrb. dec Moral," Göttingen, 1825, p. 354. Sodeur ["Luther and die Lüge"] says that in his teaching on les Luther led the way to "a more profound understanding of the problem" [p. 2), he taught us "to act according to simple and fundamental principles"; "under esstain conditions" it became "a duty to tell untrutae, not merely on casuatic grounds as formerly [', but on principle; Luther harked lack to the all embracing dity of charity which constitutes the reseal life of the Christian" (p. 30); he desired "falsehold to be used only to the advantage of our neighbour," "referring our conduct in every materice is the underlying principle of charity" (p. 32 f.). Chr. Rogge, another Protestant, says of all time of Turmer," Jan., 1906, p. 4911; "I wish flotour had adopted a micro decided and less apologetic attitude."

W. Walther, in the actuels quoted above (p. 61, n. 1), admits that Luther taught "in the electron possible manner that cases might coons where a departure from truth became the Christian's duty. . . . It is probable that many Evangelisals well strongly reputiate this those, but, in our openiors, simost everybody follows it in practice ", if clearly led to untruth their the setter was no evil set, and it could

It must be specially noted that Luther does not justify lies of convenience, merely when told in the interests of our neighbour, but also when made use of for our own advantage when such is well pleasing in God's aight. This he states explicitly when speaking of Isane, who denied his marriage with Reheren no as to save his life. "This is no sin, but a serviceable he by which he escaped being put to death by those with whom he was staying; for this would have happened had he said Rebeeca was his wife "1. And not only the lawful motive of personal advantage justifies, according to him, such untruths as do not injure others, but much more the love of God or of our nearbbour, i.e. regard for God's honour; the latter motive it was, according to hun, which influenced Abraham, when he gave out that Sarah was his mater. Abraham had to co-operate in accomplishing the great promise made by God to him and his progeny; hence he had to preserve his life, " in order that he might honour and glorify God thereby, and not give the he to God's promises." Many Catholic interpreters of the Bible have sought to find expedients whereby, without justifying his lie, they might yet exonerate the great Patriarch of any fault. Luther, on the contrary, following not be mid that Lather accepted the principle that the end justifies the means. It was not necessary for Walther, having made Lother's views on lying his own, to assure us, "that they were not shared by every Christian, not even by every Evangelical." As regards the end justifying the means, Walther should prive that the principle does not really underlie much of what Luther says (op also above, p. 94.f.). Op, what A. Baur mays, with presencethy franches, in a work or titled "Johann Calvin." ("He ignossywchicht! Vallab.," Roths 4, Hft. 9), p. 29, concurring the reformer of Geneva which he extells. "Consciously, or unconsciously, the principle that the end just fies the means became necessarily more and more deeply resided in Calvin a mand, will the principle that the hidy purpose willed by God justifies the use of means—the employment of which would otherwise appear altogether repagnant and reperhensible to a refined moral sense—at least when no other way presents itself for the attainment of the end. To renounce the end or account of the means approve the principle that the end justifies the means.

We may add that, according to Walther ("Die Sittlehlert nach Lather," 1909 p. 11 f.), Lather, in view of the exacted end towards which the means he used were directed, "gradies y resolved" to set the law of charity above that of trath; he did not, however do thus in his practical writings, fearing its above; yet Lather still contends that Abraham was permitted to tell in air truth in order "to prevent the frustration of God's Will," to from love of God (dod., p. 13).

1 " Opp. int. exeg.," 6, p. 289.

his own arbitrary interpretation of the Bible, approves, may, even glories in the fault. "If," he says, "the text be taken thus [according to his interpretation] no one can be scandalised at it; for what is done for God's honour, for the glory and furtherance of His Word, that is right and well done and deserving of all praise."

On such principles as these, what was there that Luther could not justify in his polemies with the older Church?

In his eyes everything he undertook was done for "God's glory." "For the sake of the Christian Church," he was ready, to tell " a downright lie " (above, p. 51) in the Hessian affair "Against the deception and depravity of the Papal Antichrist," he regarded everything "as permissible " for the salvation of souls (above, p. 95); moreover, was not the war he was waging part of his divine mission! The public welfare and the exalted interests of his work might therefore at any time call for a violation of the truth. Was he to be deterred, perhaps, by the injury his opponents might thereby suffer? By no means suffered no real miury: on the contrary, it all redounded to their spiritual good, for by ending the reign of prejudice and error their souls would be saved from immment peril and the way paved for the accomplishment of the ancient promises " to the glory and furtherance of the Word."

We do not mean to say that Luther actually formed his conscience thus in any particular instance. Of this we cannot judge and it would be too much to expect from him any statement on the subject. But the danger of his doing so was sufficiently proximate.

The above may possibly throw a new light on his famous words: "We consider everything allowable against the deception and depravity of the Papal Antichrist."

Luther's Influence on His Circle.

Our remarks on Luther and lying would be incomplete were we not to refer to the influence his example and theory exercised on his surroundings and on those who assisted him in establishing the new Church system.

Melanchthon not only incurred, and justly too, the repreach of frequently playing the dishonest diplomatist, particularly [&]quot;Opp. lat. exeg.," 3, pp. 139-144.

 To Johann Lang, Aug. 16, 1520, above, p. 95, a. 3.

DISHONESTY OF LUTHER'S FRIENDS 113

at the Diet of Augsburg, thut even advocated in his doctrinal works the Lutheran view that lying is in many cases lawful.

"The be of convenience," he says, " is preserverthy, it is a good uncludie and processe from charity breads one desires thereby to help one's neighbour." Hence, we may infer, where the coject was to bring the Evangel home to a sinn, a lie was all the lass reprehensible. Metaschibon appeals to Abraham a statement that Surah was his sister. Care all and ax), and to the artifice of Elsous (4 Kings vi. 19), but overlooks the fact that these instances prove nothing in his toward more three no " neighbour was helped," but, on the sontrary, untruth was dictated purely by self-love."

During the negotiations carried on between England. Hence and Senony in view of an ecclerisational understanding, Melanch thou, at the instance of the Elector of Seniory, drew up for him and the Landgrave, a document to be sent to Herry VIII of England, giving him information concerning the Assimption recent to then. His treatment of the matter has already been referred to two mit, p. 374), but it now calls for more detailed report ration.

In this writing Melanchthon, to serve the interests of the new Everyel, had the courage to deny that the movement had made its appearance in these parts of Germany "where the pure Gospel is proclaimed," but was only to be met with "where the people are not preserved from such arrors by sound distrine," VIA " In Friend and Westphalm. " The fact is that it o Anabaptests were so numerous in the Saxon Electorate that we constantly hear of prosecutions being instituted against them. P. Wappley, for instance, quotes an official minute from the Weimar archives, actually distert in 1536, which states that the Elector * enumed many Anni-activity to be principled and put to death by drowning and the sword, and to miffer long terms of improviment. * Shortly before Metanchi sen wrote the above, two Analogotots had here executed in the bases Electorate. Beyond all doubt them facts were known to Metanet thou. The Landgrave of Hosse refused to allow the letter to be despatched. Feige, his Charcellar, pointed out the untroth of the statement, "that these errors only prevailed in places where the pure doctrone was lacking " ; on the conveye, the Analog test error was unfortunately to be found throughout terming, and even more under the Evengel than amongst the Parasts 4. As whereful version of the letter, dated Sep. 23, 1536, was eventually sent to the King. Wangier, who relates all this fully, says. " Melanch. then was obviously mile west by his wish to warn the large of the 'plague' of the Anabaptist hereby and to predict our

17 -1

Hee vol. H., p. 384 ff. " Corp. ref.," 20, p. 373.

The document in "Corp. ret., 3, p. 576.

Die Stellung Kunnebeens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Heusen zur Täuferbewegung," Münster, 1910, p. 75.
 Op. Lenn, "Eriofwechsel Philipps," 1, p. 320, for the "pure doctrine of the Evangel," " "What he said was guringly at variance with the actual facts."

Like Luther, Martin Bucer, too, urged the Landgrave to tell a deliberate lie and openly deny his biganty. Though at first unwilling he had undertaken to advocate the Landgrave's bigumy with Luther and had defended it personally (above, p. 28). In spite of this, however, when complications arose on its becoming public, he declared in a letter of 1541 to the preachers of Memmingen, which so far has received little attention, that the Landgrave's wrong stensome rumours of which had reached his earn, should it prove to be true, could not be laid to his charge or to that of the Wittenbergers. "I declare before God ("coran Dec affirmo"). that no one has given the Prince such advice, neither I, not Eather, nor Philip, nor, so far as I know, any Ressian. preacher, nor has anyone taught that Christians may keep concubates as well as their wives, or declared hanself ready to defend such a step ". And, again calling God to witness (" here ren ut coram Den scripta"), he declares that he had never written or signed anything in defence of the biganiy.2 In the following year be appeared before the magistrates of Strasburg and, in the presence of two colleagues, ' took God to witness concerning the suspicion of having advised the Landgrave the other marriage," "that the latter had consulted neither him nor any preacher concerning the matter"; he and Capito had "throughout been opposed to it " (the bigamy), " a though his help had been sought for in such matters by honourable and highly placed persons."* The reference here is to Henry VIII of England, to whom, however, he had never expressed his disapproval of bigamy, in fact he, like Capito and the two Wittenbergers (above, p. 4), bad declared his preference for Henry's taking an extra wife rather than divorcing his first.

Bucer (who had so strongly myc ghed against Luther's lies, above, p. 99), where it was a question of a Catholic opponent like the Augustin in Johann Hoffmeister, had

Loc. ck., p. 74 f.
 "Corp. ref.," 10, p. 150 mq. N. Paulas in "Hist-pol, Bl.," 147.

^{1911,} p. o.e.

Qual defendam dynam for a us, considere million (secreption) secrept and value r par * Landius, that, p. vil.

F. W. Hossenkamp, "Hessische Kt.," I, p. 510. Publus, ibid., p. 5(2)

DISHONESTY OF LUTHER'S FRIENDS 115

himself recourse to notorious calumnies concerning this man. whom even Protestant historians now allow to have been of blameless life and the "greatest enemy of immorality,"1 He accused him of "dancing with nuns," of "wallowing in vice," and of being "an utterly abandoned, infamous and dissolute knave," all of them groundless charges at very most based upon mere hearsay. This same Bucer, who accused the Catholic Princes of being double-tongued and pursuing dubious policies, was himself notorious amongst his own party for his wiliness, deceit and cunning.

Johann Bugenhagen, the Pastor of Wittenberg, when called upon to acknowledge his share in a certain questionable memorandum of a semi-political character also laid himself open to the charge of being wanting in truthfulness

(vol. iii., p. 74 f.).

P. Kalkoff has recently made clear some of Wolfgang Capito's double-dealings and his dishonest behaviour, though he hesitates to condemn him for them. Capito had worked in Luther's interests at the Court of Archbishop Albert of Mayence, and there, with the Archbishop's help, " rendered incalculable services to the Evangeheal cause." In extenuation of his behaviour Kalkoff says: " In no way was it more immoral than the integues" of the Elector Frederick. On the strength of the material he has collected J. Greving rightly describes Capito as a "thoroughbred hypocrite and schemer." The dealings of this "eminent diplomatist," as Greving also terms him, remind us only too often of Luther's own dealings with highly placed ecclesiastics and seculars during the first period of his apostasy. If, in those early days, Luther's theory had already won many friends and imitators, in the thick of the fight it made even more converts amongst the new preachers. men ready to make full use of the allumng principle, that, against the depravity of the Papacy everything is heit.

From vituperation to the violation of truth there was but a step amidst the passion which prevailed. How Luther's abuse—estensibly all for the love of his neighbour—infected his pupils is plain from a letter in the newly published

⁴ H. Rocholl, in N. Paulun's art, on the Catholic lawyer and writer, Conrad Braun (†1563), m 'Hist. Jahrb.' (14, 1893, p. 517 fl.), p. 525.

Paulus, "Johann Hoffmeister," 1891, p. 206, and m "Hist Jahrb.," Joc. cit.

"Theol. Rev.," 1908, p. 215.

correspondence of the Brothers Blaurer. This letter, written from Wittenberg on Oct. 8, 1522, by Thomas Blaurer, to Ulrich Zamus, contains the following: "Not even from the most filthy and shameful vituperation [of the hateful Papacy] shall we shrink, until we see it everywhere despised and abhorred." What had to be done was to vindicate the doctrine that, "Christ is our ment and our satisfaction." Luther, he says, poured forth abuse ("convicio"), but only to God's glory, and for the "salvation and encouragement of the little ones."

4. Some Leading Standers on the Mediaval Church Historically Considered

" In Luther's view the Middle Ages, whose history was fashioned by the Popes, was a period of darkest night. . . . This view of the Middle Ages, particularly of the chief factor in medieval life, viz. the Church in which it found its highest expression, is one-sided and distorted." Such is the opinion of a modern Protestant historian. He is sorry that false ideas of the medieval Church and theology "have been sheltered so long under the egis of the reformer's name." -- "It will not do," a lay Protestant historian, as early as 1874, had told the theologians of his faith, speaking of Köstlin's work "Luthers Theologie," "to ignore the contemporary Catholic literature when considering Luther and the writings of the reformers . . . It is indispensable that the condition of theology from about 1490 to 1510 should be carefully examined. We must at all costs rid ourselves of the carrestures we meet with in the writings of the reformers, and of the misunderstandings to which they gave rise, and learn from their own writings what the theologians of that time actually thought and taught." " Paradoxical as it may sound, it is just the theological side of the history of the Reformation which, at the present day, is least known."4

³ Rd. 1, 1008, p. 66 : ⁴ Nollin convec in parcentus quantumens turpulous et agrammana, ¹¹ etc.

1 Luthers friend. Jones as a distinguished himself in controversy by the character of the charges he brings forward against I is opponents as two "histories". See shows tell as a 446 m. 3.3.

no true "Justome," "See above, vol. m., p. 416. n. 3.)

* W. Köhler, "Luthers Werden" ("Peot, Monatshefte," 1907, Hit 5-9, p. 2223 ff., p. 347 ff. p. 294).

Maurenbrucher, "Stadion und Skizzen zur Gesch, der Reform," pp. 221, 220.

During the last Afty years German scholars have devoted themselves with zeal and enthusiasm to the external and social aspect of the Middle Ages. That great undertaking, the "Monumenta Germania: historica," its periodical the "Archiv," and a number of others dealing largely with mediaval history brought Protestants to a juster and more objective appreciation of the past. Yet the theological, and even in some respects the ecclesiastical, side has been too much neglected, chiefly because so many Protestant theologians were accupulous about submitting the subject to a new and unprejudiced study. Hence the astomishment. of so many when Johannes Janssen, with his " History of the German People," and, to pass over others, Heinrich Deniffe with his work on Luther entered the field and demonstrated how incorrect had been the views prevalent unce Luther's time concerning the doctrine and the ecclesiantical life of his age. Astonishment in many soon made way for indignation; in Dendic's case, particularly, annoyance was caused by a certain attitude adopted by this author which led some to reject in their entirety the theologico-historical consequences at which he arrived, whilst even Janssen was charged with being biasied. Other Protestants, however, have learned something from the Catholic works which have since made their appearance in greater numbers, have acknowledged that the ideas hithertoin vogue were behind the times and have invited scholars to undertake a more exact study of the materials.

"The later Meddle Ages," says W. Friedensburg speaking of the prevising Protestant view, "seemed only to serve as a fed for the history of the Reformation, of which the glowing colours stood out all the more clearly against the dark background." "As late at a few years ago the history of the close of the Middle Ages was almost a "terra incognita." "Unly through Jarssen, Friedensburg continues, "were we led to study more carefully the later Middle Ages " and to discover, amongst other things, that the "majority of the people [sir] had not really been so generate of the truth of Christianity," that "the Church had not yet lost her power over prople a middle." that "to wants the end of the Middle Ages the people had already been growing familiar with the Bible," and that "sermons in the vulgar tongue had not been neglected to the extent that has been frequently nonined. "This suchor, the H. Bohmer, characterists it as error-outs." to suppose that Luther was the first to revive report for Paul and to restore Paulicism." or "to inseet upon the reform of goldoess on the model of the theology of Christ." Coming to Deside, he says, that the latter "on account of his learning was without a doubt qualified as accreely any other schools of our time for the task he undertook. When he published his 'Luther' he could look back on many years of solid and fruitful labour in the field of mediarval Scholasticism and Mysticism." From Denifie's work it is clear that Luther was "but little conversant with mediaval Scholasticism, particularly that of Thomas Agumas."

"Denific is right," wrote Gustav Kawerau in an important Protestant theological periodical, "and touches a weak spot in Luther research when he reproaches us with not being sufficiently acquainted with modisival theology." An "examination of the Catholic surroundings in which Luther moved" is, so Kawerau friends, essential, and Protestants must therefore apply themselves to "the examination of that theology which influenced Luther."

What is, however, imperative is that this theology be, if possible, examined without Luther's help, i.e. without, as usual, paying such exaggrested regard to his own statements as to what influenced him.

Luther, moreover, does not always speak against the Middle Ages; un occasion he can employ its language himself, particularly when he thinks he can quote, in his own interests, utterances from that time. What W. Köhler says of a number of such instances holds good here: "Luther fancied he recognised himself in the Middle Ages, that is why his historical judgment is so often false." In point of fact, as the same writer remarks, "Luther's idea of history came from his own interior experience; this occupies the first place throughout." If for "interior experience" we substitute "subjective bias" the statement will be even more correct.

In returning here to some of Luther's legends mentioned above (p. 92 f) concerning the Catholic past and the religious views then prevailing, our object is merely to show by a few striking examples how wrong Luther was in charging the Middle Ages with errors in theology and morals.

One of his most frequently repeated accusations was, that the Church before his day had merely taught a hollow "holiness by works"; all exhortations to picty uttered by [&]quot;Fortschritte in Kenntins und Verständnis der RG," ("Schriften des Vereine für RG,," No. 180, 1919, pp. 1-69, pp. 4, 5, 7, 8, 10, 12, 16 f.). The author's standpoint is expressed on p. 13. "It is self-evident that this does not in any way detract from Luther's importance. . . . Luther merely stands out all the more as the last link of the previous evolution," etc. On p. 17 he declares that the author of "Luther und Luthertum" incked entirely the "seeme of truth." See the passage from Böhmer in "Luther im Lichte der neueren Forschung," 3, 1991, p. 144.

p. 144.
 j. "Theo! Stud. und Krit.," 1908, p. 581,
 j. "Luther and die KG.," J. 1900, p. 363.

preachers and writers insisted solely on outward good works, of the need of cultivating an inward religious spirit, intertor virtues or true right-council of beart no one had any conception.

Against this we may set a few Catholic statements made disring the years shortly before Luther's appearance.

Gabriel Biol, the "standard thrologian" of his time, whose works Lother husself had studied during his theological course, in one of his sermons distinctly advocates the Church's deciring against any external believes by-works. Commenting on the tempel necount of the hyperroy and externation of the Pharaesa and their problems of hotmess, he passes at the passage "Except your rightenument exceed the rightenument of the Beribte and Pharseers ye shall not enter the Isingtons of Heaven ? (Ms. v. 20). "Hence, if we desire to be saired," he ears, " our rightcourness must not merely be shown in outward worige but must roude in the heart, for without the nevard spirit, outward Works are neither with acid her measurementhy, though the spirit they he so without outward to the ". After proving this he again. innets. "Thus true service of God does not consist in externals, on the contrary it is on the inward, pour acts of the will that everything depends, and this presupposes a right judgment and the recognition of the sports. Hence in the practice of good works we must expend greater care on the interior direction of the wall ". The learned preacher goes on fervently to exhort his bearers to amend their lives, to be humble, to trust in Christ and to lend lives of real, inward piety. 1.

Another pronour and the slog as with whom Lather was well orquested was Andrew Proces of 15t3), the founder of the Comman Augustician Congregation to which Lucher had once belonged. In the errors published by Petrus Sylvius, Profes finnels upon the good intention and interior disposition by which works are san titled. They are "smothered," so he tells his bearers, "if done not out of love for God but with evil intent, for instance, for the main of present or in order to decease, or again, if done in our or for any bad purpose." . "Hence . . . in the practice of all his works a man must diligently ate ve after Divine passive, after a true faith with love of that and of his Brighbour, efter innocence and busility of heart, with a good purpose and intention, since every good work, however insignifieast, even a draft of cold water given to the common creature for God's suke, is deserving of researd in electric . Without charity neither faith nor good works are profitable unto salvatown," 9 was also condomned by the learned Franciscan theologian, Stophen Brulefer. "Ment," so he emphasses, "depends not on the number of external works but on the seal and charity with which the work is done, everything depends on the interior act of the will." Amongst his authorities he quotes the farfamed theologian of his Order, Duns Scotus, who had enunciated the principle with the concesion of the scholastic: " Deus non pensat quantum sed ex quanto."

At about that same time the so called " holinous by works "

¹ Source 60 in Dom. 6 post. Trin.¹¹ ("Sermones de tempure," Tubingia, 1800).

³ Naboud and Acht ader letzic Service, ⁷ Lapsie, 1533. On this work sp. Paulus, ⁸ Die doutschen Dominikasser, ⁹ p. 86, n. 2.

"God wants, not your work, but your heart." So Marquard of Landau writes in his "Buch der X Gepot," printed in 1483. Before this, under the heading . "That we must love God above all things, ' he declares, that, whoever does not turn to God with his whole heart cannot merely by his works gain Him, even though he should surrender "al. am possessions to God and allow himself to be burnt."1

Thus we find in the writings of that period, language by no means wanting in vigour used in denunciation of the so-called " holmess-by-works "; hence Lither was certainly not first in the field to raise a protest.

From their preachers, too, the people frequently heard this same teaching.

Johann Herolt, a Dominican preacher, very celebrated at the commencement of the 15th century, points out clearly and definitely in his sermons on the Sunday Epistles, that every work must be inspired by and permeated with charity if man's actions are not to deteriorate into a mere "holiness-by-works", a poor man who, with a pure conseignce, performs the meanest good work, is, according to him, of "far greater worth in God's sight than the richest Prince who erects churches and mon, steries while in a state of mortal sin "; the outward work was of small account. Herolt thus becomes a spokesman of " inwardness" in the matter of the fulfilment of the duties of the Christian life; many others spoke as he did.

Sound instruction concerning "holiness-by-works" and the necessary "inwardness" was to be found in the most popular works of devotion at the close of the Middle Ages

Bl. 2. On the work, see Hasak. Der el ristl. Glaube des

Jeutsenen Volken beim Schluss des MA ,³¹ 1868, p. 67 ft

^{1 ii} Reportate in quatuer S. Ranaventura sententiarium libror, Scott. mblebrone and " Bosin as 1504, L. 2 di L q. 6

^{2 &}quot;Sermoner super equatolan dominicules," s. l. e. a. Bl. 61 N Prulam quotes no re of Heroit's soyings in "Johann Heroit und some Let ro, Bertrag zur Gesch, des religiosen Vockstmiternehm am Ausgang des MA.2 ("Zoitschr. f. keth. Theol.," 20, 1902, p. 417 ff. particularly Paulos, rbd., pp. 425, 430. p., 429).

The "Evangelibuch," for instance, a sermon-book with glosses on the Sunday Gospels, has the following for those who are too much devoted to outward works. "It matters not how good a man may be or how many good works he performs unless, at the same time, he loves God." The author even goes too far in his requirements concerning the interior disposition, and, agreeably with a view then held by many, will not admit as a motive for love a wholesome fear of the loss of God; he says a man must love God, staply because "he is the most excellent, highest and most worthy Good; . . . for a man filled with Divine love does not desire the good which God possesses, but merely God Himself"; thus, in his repudiation of all so-called "holiness-by-works," he actually goes to the opposite extreme."

Man becomes pleasing to God not by reason of the number or greatness of his works, but through the interior justice wrought in him by grace; such is the opinion of the Dominican, Johann Mensing. He protests against being accused of disparaging God's grace because at the same time he emphasises the value of works; he declares that he exalts the importance of God's sanctifying Grace even more than his opponents (the Lutherans) did, because, so he says, " we admit (what they deay, thereby disparaging the grace of God), vis. that we are not simply saved by God, but that He so mises and glorifies our nature by the bestowal of grace, that we are able ourselves to ment our salvation and attain to it of our own free will, which, without His Grace, would be impossible. Hence our belief is not that we are led and driven like cattle who know not whither they go. We my: God gives us His grace, faith and chanty, at first without any merit on our part: then follow good works and merits, all flowing from the same Grace, and finally eternal happiness for such works as bring down Grace."*

This was the usual language in use in olden time, particularly in the years just previous to Luther, and it was in accordance with this that most of the faithful obediently shaped their lives. If abuses occurred—and it is quite true that we often do meet with a certain degree of formalism in the customs of the people—they cannot be regarded as the rule and were reproved by sealous and clear-sighted churchmen.

2 " Brrettunge des christl. Beacheydts," naw , 1520, 32, Bl. 4, h. S.

¹ "Evangelitaich," Augsburg, 1566, Bl. 15. Cp. the Basis " Plenerous," 1514, El. 25.

A favourite work at that time was the "Imitation of Christ" by Thomas à Kempis. Thousands, more particularly amongst the clergy and religious, were edified by the fervent and touching expositions of the author to permente all works with the spirit of interior picty.\(^1\) We know how strongly be condemns formalism as exemplified in frequent pilgrimages devoid of virtue and the spirit of penance, and how he does not spare even the religious;\(^1\) the habit and the tonsure make but little alteration, but the moral change and the entire mortification of the passions make a true religious.\(^1\)

The practice of works of charity, which at that time flourished exceedingly among both clergy and laity, offered a field for the realisation of these principles of the true spirit in which good works are to be performed. We have countless proofs of how the faithful in Germany despoiled themselves of their temporal goods from the most sincere religious motives—out of love for their neighbour, or to promote the public Divine worship—" for the love of God our Lord," as a common phrase, used in the case of numerous foundations, expresses it.

G. Uhlhorn, the Protestant author of the "Ceschichte der christlichen Liebestatigkeit," also pays a tribute to the spirit which preserved charity from degenerating into mere "holmess-by-works." "We should be doing injustice to that period," he says of the Middle Ages generally, "were we to think that it considered as efficacious, i.e. as satisfactory, mere external works apart from the motive which inspired them, for instance, alms without love." In support he quotes Thomas of Aquin and Pope Innocent III, remarking, however, that even such alms as were bestowed without this spirit of love were regarded, by the standard authorities, as predisposing a man for the reception of Grace, and as deserving of temporal reward from God, hence not as altogether "worthless and improductive."

Another fable concerning the Middle Ages, sedulously fostered by Luther in his writings, was, that, in those days

Google

De instatune Christi," 1, 15, and 2 4, ... * lbsta 1, 17, 19.
 Bd. 2, Stategart, 1884, p. 143 man had never come into direct relations with God, that the hierarchy had constituted a partition between him and Christ, and that, thanks only to the new Evangel, had the Lord been restored to each man, as his personal Saviour and the object of all his hopes; Luther was wont to say that the new preaching had at length brought each one into touch with Christ the Lamb, Who taketh away our an; Melanchthon, in his funeral oration on Luther, also said of him, that he had pointed out to every sinner the Lamb in Whom he would find salvation.

To keep to the symbol of the Lamb: The whole Church of the past had never ceased to tell each individual that he must seek in the Lamb of God purgation from his guilt and confirmation of his personal love of God. The Lamb was to her the very symbol of that confidence in Christ's Redemption which she sought to arouse in each one's breast. On the front of Old St. Peter's, for instance, the Lamb was shown in brilliant mosaic, with the gentle Mother of the Redeemer on its right and the Key-bearer on its left, and this figure, in yet older times, had been preceded by the ancient "Agmis Dei."

Every Litary recited by the faithful in Luther's day, no less than in earlier ages and in our own, concluded with the trustful invocation of the "Lamb of God"; the waxen "Agent Dei," blessed by the Pope, and so highly prized by the people, was but its symbol.* The Lamb of God was, and still is, solemnly invoked by priest and people in the Canon of the Mass for the obtaining of mercy and beace.

The centre of daily worship in the Catholic Church, in Luther's day as in the remoter past, was ever the Eucharistic Sacrifice. The Lamb of God, which, according to Catholic belief, is there offered to the Father under the mystic elements, and mysteriously renews the sacrifice of the Cross, was as a well, daily opened, in which souls athirst for God might find wherewith to unite themselves in love and confidence with their Redeemer.

¹ See the figures in Green, "Analesta Romana," 1, tab. 10-12.

On the origin of the waxen "Agrice Des" and its connection with the oldest baptiamal rite, see my art in the "Unvita Cattolica," June 2, 1907. From the beginning it was a memorial of the baptiamal coverant and served as a constant stimulus to personal union with Christ.

It was Lather who, with resol hand toro this pledge of hope and consolition from the heart of Christerdom. Incoming indeed are the allowons to the wealth of consolition contained to the Eucharist, which we find in one of the bucks in most general use in the days before Lather. ' Good Jewis, it ternal the plend, thanks be to Thee Who permittest me, poor and needy as I am, to partake of the mestery of Thy I have Bacribre, and ferdest me with Thy precious Body and Blood; Thou commandest me to approach to Thee with confidence. Conve, sowest Thou, to Me, all you that labour and are burdened, and I will retresh you. Confidence, O Lord, in Thy goodness and in Thy great mercy, I come ask to my Saviour, hungry and thirsty to the Fountain of Life, needy to the King of Heaven, a servant to my Lord, a creature to my Creator, and one in decolation to my laving Comforter.'

The doctrine that the Mass is a renewal of the Sacrafice of Christ "attended at fullest development in the Middle Ages", thus Adelf Frant at the conclusion of his work." Do Messe im doutschen Mittelaltor." At the close of the Middle Ages at was the rule to " derect the eyes of the fastiful, during the secrifice on the alter, to the sufferings and death of the Redeemer in all its tourning and thistory resulty. At the alter a mystery is enacted; Christ suffers and dies; the priest represents him, and every act typinis Christa Passion; just as He expired on the cross in actual fact, in mystically, He this upon the altar "a Though some writers of the period dwell perhaps a little too much on the allegereal sense then an popular in explaining the various as to of the Mass, yet, as their conviction that its character was sacr first and that it tray re-enacted the death of Christ, they were in perfect agreement with the past. In the explanaturns of the Mass everyous was remanded of his urson with Christ, and our Lord's sufferings " were brought before the mind of both prest and people"; by the means the "metword evermapped of the Mass was made a trustim source of saward editiontion." "The abundant medsaval literature on the Mass is a proof high of the areas of the clergy, and of the care declayed by the learned and these in authority, to me ract them. In this matter the little century excels the eartier little Ages." * The very abuses and the formalism which Frank finds witnessed to in cortain meties a sermons on the Mass, chiefly in the matter of undus stress had on the "fruits of the Mass," sevent merely as over-estimation on the part of the individual of his women with Christ, or a too great assurance of obtaining help in bodily and sparstual personation, of mast of feryour or of hope there as not the least traco.

It is well worthy of note that Lather, if we may believe what he said in a sermon in 1532, even its his monastic days, did not prize or sove the close band of armon established with Christ by the daily merities of the Massir. "Ah lath, Massir. Let that cannot stand fast fall. You never cared about saying Mass formerly; of that I am sure. I know it from my own case; for I too was a boly monk, and blasphemed my dear Lord miserably for the space of quite fifteen years with my saying of Masses, though I never liked duing so, in spite of being so holy and devout."

^{6 14} De most Christi, 17 4, 1, 2

^{*} Freiburg, i/B , 1902, p. 730 f.

In spite of this Lather succeeded in bequeating to posterity the opinion that it was he who delivered people from that "alienation from God" imposed on the world in the Middle Ages; "who broke down the prohibition of the medieval Church against anyone concerning himself on his own account with matters of religion"; and who gave back "personal religion" to the Christian.

Were Protestants to bestow more attention on the religious literature of the Later Middle Ages, such statements would be simply impossible. One of those best acquainted with this literature writes: "During the last few months the present writer has gone carefully, pen in hand, through more than one hundred printed and manuscript religious works, written in German and belonging to the end of the Middle Ages: ontechetical handbooks, general works of piety, confession manuals, postils, prayer-books, booklets on preparation for death and German sermonaries. In this way he has learnt from the most reliable sources not only how in those days people were guided to devout intercourse with God, but also with what fervent piety the faithful were accustomed to converse with their Saviour." Let Protestants, he adds, at least attempt to vindicate their pet assertions " scientifically, i.e. from trustworthy sources," a

The relations between the individual and God were by no means suppressed because the priesthood stood as an intermediary between the faithful and God, or because ecclesisatical superiors watched over and directed public worship and the lines along which the life of faith was to move. If the union of the individual with God was endargered by such interference on the part of the clergy, then it was endangered just as much by Luther, who insists so strongly

^{* &}quot;Werke," Erl. ed., 201, 2, p. 401.

^{*} N. Faillis, "Reln, Volkering," 1901, No. 961, Cp. Paulin.

"Der Kathouk," 1898, 3, p. 25; "Had Luther's intention been interty to impress this fundamentally Catholic message on Christen dom the transful relations between the inchvidual and God, there would never have been a schiem."

He teaches, for metanous. "It is an unsufferable bloophomy to report the public mannery of to say that prople can become buly without arrivate and Church. The involves a destruction of the Church and reteilion against exclusive a destruction upheavals must be warded off and purished like all other revolts."

The fact is, the exclamatical order of things to which Luther attached himself more and more strongly accounted to this, as he declares in various passages of his Table Talk. Through the ministers and preachers, as through His servents, God speaks to man, through teem God buptom, metructa and almovus, what the ministers of the Gregori say and do, that God Himself down through and in us so His motraments. Wheever does not believe this, Littler levils on as daisned. In a sermon of 1528, speaking of the spiritual authority which intervenes between God and man, he exclaims: "God requires for His Kingdom proue Bahoju and pastore, through them he governs His subjects Ithe Empeyer, on the other hand, so be had said, but not even to be a Christian actor the socular power was also unward and merely served to restrain evil disers). If you will not bearies to these Bushoju and pastom, then you will have to listen to Master Hana [the hangman] and get no thanks either."1

He need amiliar integrange in his memoria on Matthew "God, by means of Prophets and Agnetics, ministers and preachers, baptions, gives the increments, preaches and consider, without preachers and hely pressue, He then nothing, just as He does not govern land and prophe without the secular power."4

Hence Luther shows himself very annuus to ostableh a kind of hierarchy. If then he charges the prositioned of the past with parting should between God and man, it is hard to one how he is to avied a nin let charge being brought forward against hinself. Moreover, at the bottom of his efforts, merenges of his Catholic days were at work, and the feeling that an organized mountry was affed for at the religious aentingers was not to die out roompletely among the propie. His practical judgment of the conditions even appears here in a favourable light, for instance, in those passages where he insists on the authority of rightly appropried persons to not an intermediance between God and man, and as vicers and representatives of Christ, The word Christ apoke on earth and the word of the preacher, are, he mays, one and the sense " is at effe in," because Chest and . " He that henceth you beareth me ' (Luho n. 14); "God deals with un through them instruments, through them 150 works everything and offers as all His treasures. 14 Indeed, 11st is our Corp. ref.," 4, pp. 737-740.

¹ Cp. one vol. ii., p. 297. 1 "Weelee," Wests, ed., 27, p. 418.

Wineken ib its min, 45, p. 184.

^{*} Mathesium, Tischreden " (Kroher), p. 180, greatest privilege that we have such a ministry and that God is so near to us; for he that hears Christ hears God Himself; and he that hears St. Peter or a preacher, hears Christ and God Himself speaking to us."

"We must always esteem the spoken Word very highly, for those who despise it become hereties at once. The Pope despises this ministry "* [!]. God, however, "has ordained that no one should have faith, except thanks to the preachers office," and, "without the Word, He does no work whatever in the Church."

Thus we find Luther, on the one hand insisting upon an authority, and, on the other, demanding freedom for the interpretation of Scripture. How he sought to harmonise the two is reserved for later examination. At any rate, it is to misapprehend both the Catholic Church and Luther's own theological attitude, to say that "independent study of religious questions" had been forbidden in the Middle Ages and was "reintroduced" only by Luther, that he removed the "blinkers" which the Church had placed over people's eyes and that henceforward "the representatives of the Church had no more call to assume the place of the Living God in man's regord."

Luther also laid claim to having revived respect for the secular authorities, who, during the Middle Ages, had been despised owing to the one-sided regard shown to the monks and clergy. He declares that he had again brought people to esteem the earthly calling, family life and all worldly employments as being a true serving of God. Boldly he asserts, that, before my time, "the authorities did not know they were serving God"; "before my time nobody knew . . . what the secular power, what matrimony, parents, children, ma ter, servant, wife or maid really signified." On the strength of his assertions it has been stated, that he revived the "ideal of life" by discovering the "true meaning of vocation," which then became the "common property of the civilised world"; on this account he was "the creator of those theories which form the foundation upon which the modern State and modern civilisation rest. 30

The fact is, however, the Church of past ages fully

* Ibul p. 193, * Ibul., p. 323.

Mathesius, ¹⁴ Tischreden ¹⁴ (Kroker), p. 230.

recognised the value of the secular state and spheres of activity, saw in them a Divine mititution, and respected and cherished them accordingly.

A very high esteem for all accular callings is plainly expressed in the armons of Johann Herelt, the famous and influential Nuremberg Dominican, whose much read." Sermons de tempors at de Sanctis." (Latin outlines of sermons for the use of Gorman preachers) had, prior to 1500, appeared in at least forty different aditions.

"It has been asked." he says in one sermon, "whether the labour of parents for their children is monitorious. I reply: You, if only they have the intention of bringing up their children for the glory of God and in order that they may become good servants of Chnet. If the perents are in a state of grace, then all their trouble with their children, in eaching them, bothing them, carrying them about, dresong them, feeding them, watching by them, teaching and reproving them, redounds to their eternal reward. All this becomes meritorious. And in the same way when the father labours hard in order to earn bread for his wife and children, all this is mentonous for the life beyond." -- A high regard for work in literature expressed in Hallermoon." To workmen, " which begins with the words, " Man is been to labour on the bird is to fly "4. Another sermin prises the calling of the merchant, which he calls a "good and necessary profersion."1

Another uniness to the Church's extern for worldly callings and employments in Mercus von Wesla, a Saton Dominican. In the discourse he delivered on the "Our Father" at Lespag, in 1801, he mays: "All these pray who do more good work and Irve virtuously." For everything that a man does to the praise and glory of God is really prayer. A man n set always do what his state of life and his calling demands. "Hence it follows that many a prior peasant, husbandman, artisan or other man who dress his work, or whatever he undertakes in such a way as to redound to God a glory, is more pleasing to God, by reason of the work he daily performs, and game more ment before clod than any Carthusian or Fr ar, he he like h, Grey or White, who stands daily in choir singing and praying."

It is evident that tatholic statements, such as that just quoted from Heroit, concerning the care of cludden being well pleasing to Gid, have been overlooked by those who extel Lather as having been the first to discover and teach, that even to suck chadren's studies and wash their availabling clothes in a noble, Christian work. What is, however, most curious is the assurance with which Lather houself claimed the merit of this discovery, is connection with his teaching on marriage.

The Carthunian, Ethard Gross, speaks very finely of the ^{} Sormo $5 de tempore.

  Sormo $5 de tempore.
  Sormones raper opérioles dominacales.
  Sormo 15.

^{1 &}quot; Eine mutaliehe Lero," new., Leiping, 1502, c. l.

different secular callings and states of life, and meigns to them an errinently honourable place; "What are the little precious stones in Christia crown but the various classes of the Christian people, who adom the head of Christ ! For He is our Head and all the Christian people are His Body for ever and ever. Hence, amongst the ernaments of the house of God some must be virgina, others widows, some married and others charte, such as monks, priests and nums. Nor are these all, for we have also Princes, Kings and Prelates who rule the commonwealth, those who provide for the needs of the body, as, for initance, husbandmen and fishermen, tailors and morchants, bakers and shoemakers, and, generally, all tradesmen." If the general welfare is not to suffer, he says, each one must faithfully follow his calling. "Therefore whoever wishes to please God, let him suck to the order (state) in which God has placed him and live virtuously , he will then receive his reward from God here, and, after this life, in the world to come."1

Although Luther must have been well aware of the views really held on this subject, some excuse for his wild charges may perhaps be found in his small practical experience, prior to his apostasy, of Christian life in the world. His poverty had forced him, oven in childhood, into irregular ways; he had been deprived of the blessings of a truly Christian family-life. His solitary studies had left him a stranger to the active life of good Catholies engaged in secular callings, the fact of his being a monk banished him alike from the society of the bad and impious and from that of the good and virtuous. Thus is many respects he was out of touch with the stimulating influence of the world; the versatility which results from experience was still lacking, when, in his early years at Wittenberg, he began to think out his new theories on God and sin, Grace and the Fall.

"Whoever wishes to please God let him stick to the order [state] in which God has placed him." These words of Gross, the Carthusian, quoted above, remind us of a comparison instituted by Herolt the Dominican between religious Orders and the "Order" of matrimony. Commending the secular calling of matrimony, he says here, that it was instituted by God Himself, whereas the religious Orders had been founded by men: "We must know that ^{*} In a "Novelle" published by Ph Strauch in the "Zeitschr für deutsches Lutherturn," 2v. 1880, p. 369 For further part calors of the respect for worldly callings before Luther's Jay, see N. Paulin, "Luther and der Beruf", Der Katholik, 1902, I, p. 327 fl.), and in the "Lit. Beil, der Köln, Volkszing," 1903, No. 20, p. 148; likewise Deniffe, "Luther," 1°, p. 138 ff.

14. —K

God first honoured matrimony by Himself instituting it In this was the Order of matrimony exects all other Orders (' orde matrimonialis pracellit alies ordines'); for just as St. Benedict founded the Black Monks, St. Francis the Order of Frans Minor and St. Dominie the Order of Frans Preacher, so God founded matrimony."

True Christian perfection, according to the ancient teaching of the Church, is not bound up with any particular state, but may be attained by all, no matter their profession, even by the married.

Luther, and many after him, even down to the present day, have represented, that, according to the Catholic view, perfection was incapable of attainment save in the religious life, this alone being termed the "state of perfection." In his work "On Monkish Vows" he declares: "The monks have divided Christian life into a state of perfection and one of imperfection. To the great majority they have assigned the state of imperfection, to themselves, that of perfection."

As a matter of fact the "state of perfection" only means, that, religious, by taking upon themselves, publicly and before the Church, the three vows of poverty, chastity and obedience, bind themselves to atrive after perfection along this path as one leading most surely to the goal; it doesn't imply that they are already in possession of perfection, still less that they alone possess it. By undertaking to follow all their life a Rule approved by the Church, under the guidance of Superiors appointed by the Church, they form a "state" or corporation of which perfection is the aim, and, in this sense alone, are said to belong to the "state of perfection." In addition, it was always believed that equal, in fact the highest, perfection might be attained to in any state of life. Though the difficulties to be encountered in the worldly state were regarded as greater, yet the conquest they involved was looked upon as the fruit of an even greater love of God, the victory as more splendid, and the degree of perfection attained as so much the more exalted.

It is the love of God which, according to the constant teaching of the Church, constitutes the essence of perfection.

The most perfect Christian is he who full is the law of charity most perfectly, and this—notwithstanding whatever Luther may say—according to what has ever been the teaching of the Church, the ordinary Christian may quite well do in his everyday calling, and in the married as much as in the religious state. Even should the religious follow the severest of Rules, yet if he does not make use of the more abundant means of perfection at his command but lives in tepidity, then the ordinary Christian approaches more closely than he to the ideal standard of life if only he fulfils his duties in the home with greater love of God.

¹ " Sermo 25 de tempere."

^{* &}quot;Cp. Hot. Juhrb.," 27, 1906. p. 496 ff. (N. Paulus on O. School).

The Bavarian Franciscan, Casper Schatzgeyer, Luther's contemporary, is right when he says in his work "Serutinium divina scriptura": "We do not set up a twofold standard of perfection, one for people in the world and another for the religious. For all Christians there is but one order, one mode of worshipping God, one evangelical perfection. . . . But we do say this, that in cloistral life the attainment of perfection is easier, though a Christian living in the world may excel all religious in perfection."1 Forsuch is the ground he gives in a German work-" it may well happen that in the ordinary Christian state a man runs so botly and eagerly towards God as to outstrip all religious in all the essentials of Christian perfection, just as a sculptor may with a blunt chisel produce a masterpiece for superior to that carved by an unskilful apprentice even with the best and sharpest of tools."

This may suffice to clucidate the question of the Catholic ideal of life in respect of Luther's statements, a question much debated in recent controversies but not always set in as clear a light as it deserved.

The preceding remarks on Luther's misrepresentations of the Church's teaching concerning worldly callings lead us to consider his utterances on the Church's depreciation of the female sex and of matrimony.

5. Was Lather the Liberator of Womankind from "Mediaval Degradation"?

Luther maintained that he had raised the dignity of woman from the depths to which it had fallen in previous ages and had revived due respect for married life. What the Church had defined on this subject in the past he regarded as all rubbish. Indeed, "not one of the Fathers," he says, "ever wrote anything notable or particularly good concerning the married state." But, as in the case of the secular authority and the preaching office, so God, before the coming of the Judgment Day, by His special Grace and through His Word, i.e. through the new Evangel, had restored married life to its rightful dignity, "as He had at first instituted and ordained it." Marriage, so Luther asserts, had been regarded as "a usage and practice rather than as a thing ordained by God. In the same way the secular authorities did not knew that they were serving God, but were all tied up in ceremonies. The preaching office, too, was nothing but a sham consisting of cowls, tonsures, orlings," etc.*

¹ Basie, 1522, B. 1'.

^{1 &}quot;You dem waren christl. Lebes." Bl. C. 3'.

In short, by his teaching on marriage he had ennobled worman, whereas the Catholics had represented matrimony as an "unchristian" state, only permitted out of necessity, even though they called it a Sacrament.²

Conspectus of Luther's Distortion of the Catholic View of Marriage.

Luther based his charges chiefly on the canonical enforcement of clerical celibacy and on the favour shown by the Church to the vow of chastity and the monastic life. How this proved his contention it is not easy to see. Further, he will have it, that the Church taught that true service of God was to be found only in the monastic state, and that vows were a sure warrant of salvation—though, as a matter of fact, neither Church nor theologians had ever said anything of the sort.

In his remarks on this subject in 1527 he openly accused the Papista of saying that "whoever is desirous of having to do with God and spiritual matters must, whether man or woman, remain unmarried," and "thus," so he says, "they have scared the young from matrimony, so that now they are sunk in fornication," grounds. Cp. below, p. 147.

1 "Werke," Erl. ed., 61, p. 178. 2 Ibid

* Denifie, "Luther and Lutherlum," 13, p. 71 ff., pp. 155, 238, 242.

* "Werke," Werm, ed., 24, p. 55.

What follows has, it is true, no close relation to "Luther and Lying"; the author has, however, thought it right to deal with the matter here because of the connection between Luther's murepresentations of the Middle Ages and his calumny against Catholic times, both of which were founded, not on the facts of the case, but on personal grounds. Cp. below, p. 147.

At first Luther only ventured on the charge, that matrimony had been "de facto ' forbidden, though it had not actually been declared steful, by the Pope ,1 by forbidding the monks to marry he had fulfuled the prophecy in 1 Timothy iv. 1 ff , concerning the latter times, when many would fall away from the faith and ferhid people to marry. "The Pope forbids marriage under the symblence of spantuality." "Bquire Pope has forbidden rearrange, because one had to come who would prohibit marrange. The Pope has made man to be no longer man, and woman to be no longer woman."

As years passed Luther went further; forgetful of his admission that the Pope had not made matrimony airful, he exclusived: To hen and to his followers marriage is a sin. The Church had hitherto treated marriage as something "non-Christ as " ;* the rearried state she had "handed ever to the devil"; her theologiaan look down on it as a "low, immoral port of life," and her religious can only renounce it on the ground that it is a kind of legalmed "meontinence."

In reality, however, religious, when taking their yow, merely acted on the Christian principle which St. Augustine expresses as follows: Although "all chastity, conjugal as well as veginal, has its most in God's mght," yet, "the latter is higher, the former less exaited." They merely renounced a less perfect state for one more perfect, they could, moreover, appeal not only to I Cor. vol. 33, where the Apostle speaks in praise of the greater freedom for serving God which the ceubate state affords, but even to Luther himself who, in 1523, had interpreted this very passage in the same sense, and that with no hitle warmth *

His later and still more extravagant statements converning the Catholic view of marriage can hardly be taken genously ; his perversion of the truth is altogether too great.

He says, that married people had not been neare that God "had ordained" that state, until at last God, by His special Grace, and before the Judgment Day, had restored the dignity of matrimony no less than that of the secular authority and the preaching office, "through His Word [18, through Lither a preaching ." The blame for this state of things went back very

Cp. Denifie, ibid., p. 230 f.

" Werks," Weim. ed., 10, 2, p. 152; Erl. ed., 28, p. 194. " Wyder den falsch genantion geystlichen Standt,"

* Ibid., Weim ed., 14, p. 167, * Ibid., 24, p. 1214, * Ibid. 27, p. 26.
* "Works," Eri. ed., 162, p. 92, ... * Ibid., 31, p. 261
* Sermo 343, m. 7; Donifie, 1*, p. 243, refers also to "De bono demugali," n. 9, 27, 28.

Works," Wmm. ed., 12, p. 138 f.; "A married man cannot give himself up entirely to reaching and prayer, but m, as 5t. Paul mys, "divided and must devote a great part of his life to pleasing his spouse. The Apostic cave that though the "troubles and cave of the married state are good, yet it is far better to be ree to pray and astend to the Word of tool " - Lather is more elect concerning our Lord a own recommendation of virginity (* Non-owner regional cyclinafated, sed quibus datum cal," etc., Mat. zix 11 f.). Of his attitude Sowards voluntary virginity we have already spoken in virtual, 246 fb.

for, for the Pathers, like Jerome, "had seen in matrimony more consuchity," and for this reason had disparaged it."

The Prophet Daniel had formers the degradation of marriage under the Papacy : It is of the Papal Antichnet " that Daniel mays [12, 37], that he will wallow in the unnatural vice which is the recompense due to contempera of God (Rom. 1, 127), in what we cal. Italian weddings and adent air. For matrimony and a right love and use of women he shall not know. Such are the hornbie abominations prevailing under Pope and Turk." "The same prophet," he writes chowhere. "mys that Antithrist shall stand on two pillars, vit : idelatey and rebbacy. The ided he calle Massam, thus using the very letters which form the word Mass." The Pope had deluded people, on the one hand by the Main, and, on the other, "by relibery or the unmarried state, finding the whole world with a simbleness of exactity. These are the two pillars on which the Papacy rests, him the house of the Pholestones in Barneon e time. If God chose to make Lather play the part of Samoon, by hold on the pillers. and shake them, so that the house fall on the whole multitude, who could take it ill ? He is God and wonderful are His ways. "*

Luther appeals expressly to the Pope s "books" in which marriage is another of an a "modul state." The Paporta, when they termed marriage a carrament, were only speaking " out of a falso boart " and trying to conceal the fact that they really locked ers it as " forme ation. . " They have turned all the words and acts of married people into mortal star, and I myself, when I was a monk, at ared the same opinion, via that the married state was domnable state."*

This mone was want ng to fill up the measure of his falsehoods. One worders whether Luther, when putting forward statements on incredible, mover fore-our that his own earlier writings might be examined and his later statements chadeaged in their light? Certainly the contradiction between the two is patent. We have only to glance at his explanation of the fourth and ick h Commandrants in his work on the Ten Commandments, published In 1918, to learn from Luther himself what Catholics really thought of marriage, and to be convinced that it was anything but despued; there, as in other of his early writings, Luther indeed esterns virginity shows marriage, but to term the latter sinful and damnable never occurred to him,

The olden Church had painted an ideal picture of the virgin. By this, though not alone by this, she voiced her respect for woman, from that Christian standpoint which differs so much from that of the world. From the earliest

- ¹ "Weeker," Rel. ed. 61, p. 176 (Table Talle).
- * Hed., 64, p. 188. From his glossen on the Juble
- * Had, 31, p. 200. From the Waterle mover, 1534.
- * Ited, 44, p. 376.

 * Ited, p. 267, p. 432, ep. p. 436

 * "Opp. at ever. " 6, p. 263, " Ipne eye, came essent adhise monachte, idem auprebeim, coningrum coor damontum genus vite."

times she, like the Gospel and the Apostle of the Gentiles, set up voluntary virginity as a praiseworthy state of life. Hereby she awakened in the female sex a noble emulation for virtue, in particular for seclusion, purity and morality—woman's finest ornaments—and amongst men a high respect for woman, upon whom, even in the wedded state, the ideal of chastity east a radiance which subdued the impulse of passion. Virgin and mother alike were recommended by the Church to see their model and their guide in the Virgin Mother of our Saviour. Where true devotion to Mary flourished the female sex powessed a guarantee of its dignity, from both the religious and the human point of view, a pleage of enduring respect and honour.

How the Church of olden days continued to prize matrimony and to view it in the light of a true Sacrament is evident from the whole literature of the Middle Ages. Such being its teaching it is incomprehensible how a well known Protestant encyclopædia, as late as 1898, could still venture to say: "As against the contempt for marriage displayed in both religious and secular circles, and to counteract the immorality to which this had given use, Luther vindicated the honour of matrimony and placed it in an entirely new light."

In those days Post is enjoyed a wider circulation than any other popular works. The First s, however, do not teach "rontempt of marriage," but quite the contrary. "The Mirror of Human Conduct," published at Augsburg in 1476, indeed gives the first place to virginity, but declares: "Marriage is good and hely," and must not be either despised or rejected; those who "are mated in matrimony" must not imagine that the maids (virgins) alone are God's elect; "Christ preses marriage, for it is a hely state of afe in which many a man becomes hery, for marriage was instituted by our Lord in Paradise"; from Christ is presence at the marriage at Casa we may lafer that "the married life is a hely life."

Other works containing the same tracking are the "Evangel-back," e.g. in the Augsburg edition of 1487, the "Postsis on the Four Coopels throughout the year," by Gerler of Kaysemberg († 1510), issued by Heinrich Wessner at Stracking in 1522, and the important Basis "Pleasing " of 1814, in which the author, a monk, writes: "The conjugal state is to be held in high respect on account of the honour done to it by God."; he also appends some excellent instructions on the duties of married people, cone using with a reference to the story of Tohius " win hypit will find in the Bible" (which, accordingly, he assumed was open to his readers).

The "Marriage-broklets" of the close of the Middle Ages form a literary group apart. One of the best is "Lin nutsisch Lehre and Predigt, wie nich gwei Menechen in dem Berritteint der Ehe halten seilen," which was in existence in $48, as early as 1860. "Lond Higwell instituted marriage, it tells us, " when He mad, "He fruitful and multiply!" The Orders, however, were founded by Bernard, Augustine Benedict and Institute thus the command of God is greater than that of the tracker, is the Sacrament excels all Rules made by more even by Sourie It also gives a tou-long account of how marriage is founded on love and austerned by it."

Another matrimonoid bandbook, composed by Albert von Eyli. a Franconian clone, and printed at Augusting in 1472, layeden primer on a body, divine materiality "without, however, neglecting to award still lagter encommum to the state of virginity. Erhard Gross, the Nurescherg Cartinosan about the resiste of the 15th century, wrote a "Novel" containing good advice for married people ! The bree, who was at that descens of ren an ing unmarried, deciages . " You must not think that I condomin macrimony for it is bo y and was established by God " *

Arnong the unprinted matrix ionial handbooks dating from the period before Lather's time, and cortaining a like bysoumble teaching on marriage, are the "Booklet on the Rule of Holy Matrimony,184 "On the Sagrament of Matrimony,193 and the excellent " Mirror of the Matrinoppial Order, thy the Detrime on Marcus von Wenki. 4. Fr. A. Phert, the Protestant libbographer. remarks of the latter's writings; "They effectually traverse the charges with which self-complacent ignorance loves to overwhelm the agen previous to the Saxon Reformation," and what he says applies purticularly to the teaching on marriage. T

To come now to the preachers. We must first mention Johann Herolt, concerning whose a thereo a terest Protestant writer uptry retearles, that his "wisdom and been beloned to by thousands. "I The possage already given, in which he describes marriage as an Order instituted by Christ (p. 120 f.), so but one it observe of his innity at their beautiful environs. In the very most sermon Hero's treata of the preparation which so great a burnement denoming. In the same way that people propare then selves for their Einter Constantion, so they, brice and bone gross, ranst promie themselves for matrimony by contrition and confession , for "marriage is an much a Sagrament on the Euclidrist"

¹ Fel. Ph. Strauch, "Zeitische, für deutsches Altertum," 29, 1885.

pp 375 4.7

Located enogen pur tooch Meter, 1, 2, p. 204 f.

N. Kir Sil. Zeates hr., 3, 1892, p. 487.

And yet a Protestant has said mute recently: "The Church pereistently taught that love had nothing to do with marriage" though the restraining of sexual love within just amuta was equivalent to the exclusion of conjugal love,

I Ibid., cod. 756 Marich State Library, cod germ., 757. benoemen "Die Handschriften der Herzogl. Bibnothek zu We for earlier at $4 pt 342 fc

A similar view prevailed throughout Christendem.

One of the most popular of Italian preschers was Gabrell Barietta, who died shortly after 1480. Amongst his writings there is a Lenten sermon statistic: "Do amore conjugate set do inscibur materian." In this he speaks of the "cordial leve" which united the married couple. He prests out that marriage was mutatisted in Paragase and confirmed anew by Christ, Explaining the meaning of the ring, he had that it agrees four things, all of which tood to reader Christian marriage prime-worthy. He declares that a good wife may prove an measurable treasure. If he dwells rather too much on woman's physical and treatal inferiority, this does not prevent him from vatoling the strength of the woman who is apheid by Christian virtue, and who often succeeds in programs the amendment of a godien husband.

Harletta, in his sermons, frequently follows the example of his brother from the English Don irrear preacher, Robert Hiskot († 1349), whose works were much in request at the close of the Middle Agre. 1. Hollot had such respect for Classian materiority, that he applies to it the words of the Bible. "O how breatful in the chaste generation with giory; for the memory thereof in immortal." Since the " getus matrimonialis" was willed by God, it must be assumed, he says, that it can be accomplished virtuously and with ment ! If the intention of the married enuple in the hepeting of children for the glory of Gold, they perform an act of the virtue of religion; they also exercise the virtue of justice if they have the intention of mutually fulfilling the conjugal duties to which they have pledged themselves. According to him, mutual love in the principal duty of the married couple.* Frank haliches dwest in detail on the testimony borns by the Late Middle Ages to the dignity of marriage *

^{1 is} Sermones Fratris Barlete," Brazie, 1497 and 1498, several terrors republished in the 18th scrittery. See memors for the Fasiny of the fourth week of Lent.

* Opin super Superstorm Summonie," ed. Hagenon, 1494 (and elaswhere), "Lecter" 43 and 44, us Marriage. Cp. ibid., 181, the "Lecter" on the Valiant Woman, and in his work, "In Provertie Subsection of Epoin, and in his work, "In Provertie Enforcement explanation of Prov. xii. 4. "A diagent woman is a exown to her himbard," ⁸ Luther, on the other head, declares; "The work of begetting theldren was not declared as best from other sum, such as forecast as adultery. But now we have learnt and are assured by the Grace of God that marriage is honourable." "Opp. lat. exeg.," 7, p. 116.

* On Barletta and Holkot, ap. N. Paulin in "Lat. Beil, der Keln. Velluning., 1994 Non 49 and 20., mot his art., "the Flor in der deutschen Postillen des ausgehenden MA.," and "Gedruckte und Ungedruchte deutsche Ebet vollere den ausgeberden MA.," dest 1993, Non 18 and 20. Res and Falk in "The Latinght, 1996, 2, p. 217 F. The und Ebestand on MA., and in the work about to be quoted. Denale, "Lather," I, has much to say of the Cathous and the Lutheran views of maximum.

* Die Ebe am Ausgange des MA., Eine Kirchen- und kulturhist, Btudie, * 1006 ("Erlaut, und Ergiens, zu Janusens Gesch, des d. Volkes," Commoncing with the propers of the marriage-service and the blessing of the ring, the prayers for these with child and in childhad, and for the churching of women, he give on to deal with the said rights pertaining to the married state and with the Church's eparation as witnessed to its the matrimonial handbroke and broke of instruction and adification. With the respect for the Sacrament and the dignity of the married woman there found expressed. Falk compares the sentments likewise found in the press "movels" and excelled "No inherence," and, still more practirady expressed, in the misserous endowments and denotions for the provinces of bridgl outlits. "It is quite meaning headile," such as the nother accombiners, "how non-Catho a writers even to the present time can have vestured to repromit the Charch with want of regard for the married state, 11. Of the 1st smarton concerning bridal outlits, he mays, for metance. "The above suffertion of facts, a real "makes testions" will sufficiently demonstrate what a task the Chorch of the Meldie Ages here fulfilled towards her corvents and elaktron Many other we have reletions may moreover, have manied our notice owing to absence of the decide who I have enther not been printed or have perished. From the 10th certary or wards records of such foundations become scarce."*

6. Hft. 4h

In the "Internationale Wochenschuft" Heinrich Finke printed out that he had examined hundreds of Late medies at wrmons on the position of women, with the result, that ' it is impossible to discover in them any contempt for woman "* The Inct in that " there exist countless statements of the senetity of marriage and its secret isolal character . . . state cents drawn from theologisms of the logiest standing Enthers, Scants and Doctors of the Charch. Inneed, towards the river of the Middle Ages, they grow still noise nationness. The most popular of the monks, whether Franciscans or Dominicans, have left as matrimound handbooks which imply the existence of that simple, hoppy family life they depict and encourage."4 Finks recalls the 15th century theologium, Raymond of Subunde, who points out how tanon with God in love may be reproduced in marriage. Countries theologisms are at one with him here, and follow Stripture in representing the union of Christ with the Church as an exalted figure of the marriage bend between man and wife (Fight v. 25, 3.). Of the respect which the assignt Church exhibited towards women Finks declares: "Never has the present of women here using more loudly than in the account of the Fathers and in the theological tractates of the Reliculator " Here "one picture follows another, each more dazzling than the last." Certainly we must admit, as he does, that it is for the meat part the mital of virginity which amperes them, and that it Die Stell mg der Fran im MA. " Oct. 1 and 3, 1910, p. 12 d.

 Ind., p. 12 d.
 Ibid., p. 1248.

^{* &}quot;Die Eier ein Ausgerige den MA., Eine Kirchen und kulturkist Studie," 1908 ('Erkuit, und Ergäus, zu Janesens Gesch, Jesch, Volken, '6, Hft 4), p. 6* is the good, charte, virtuous wife and widow whom they extol, rather then women pur women, as a notice part of God's treation. Their vocation as spiritual teachers naturally explains this, and if, for the same cause, they seem to be very severe in their strictures on ferminal faults, or to strike hard notice in their warnings on the spiritual dargers of ten few intercourse with the fermiosers, the must not be looked upon as "haired of warning," as has been done erroteously on the strength of some such passages in the case of lit. Autominus of Figures and Carchival Dominion.

"Just as thuck and Councils energetically took the side of marriage" when it was deemed in certain circles," so the accusation of recent times that, in the Middle Ages, wimen was universally limited upon with convenient summet stand; according to Finke this was not the cure, even in "accetical circles" and "stallion elewines." The author addices facts which " utterly disprove any such general disdain for woman."

The aslended Scriptural edicgy with which the Church so frequently becomes women in her liturgy, might, one would think, be mitter fluifficient. To the married woman who fulfile her duties in the home out of true love for God, and with seal and senicluity, the Church, in the Mass appointed for the Feasts of ³ Cp F Behaub, "Hat Jahrb.," 26, 1906, p. 117 ff., on H. Crobra, who, or order to account to Artenatus and others of "hatrod of women," appeals to the "Witches Hammer": "It is unjust to make these earthers responsible for the coordinates drawn from their attenuers by each perty fry as the producers of the "Witches Hammer." Cp. Poulus, "Histopol. Bl.," 134, 1994, participarty p. 818 ft.

* Finks, (bid., p. 1248.

Finko, ibid., p. 1141. * 368d., p. 1286. * Host, p. 12 6. Fushe's statements may be completed by the areasures that for posture was show to rearr age by both theologicans and uturgical tends, and that put merely traces "but the element proofs exist, that ' mut sal help ' was placed in the foreground as the sam of marrage. Details on this point are contained in Denille s " Luther and Lathertum," 12, p. 254 %. The following remark by a writer, as deeply versed in medius al Beholimta are, in worthy of rode " There is not a sin, is behostering of any standing, who, on this posit features for marriage in the righer arms; is at variance with Ruge of Bt. Victor, the Louisiand, or or descentand transform generally. Though there may be difference in maior posits, yet all are agreed concerning the inwinitess, geodesia, dignity and rediress of trarriage 1 (p. 24). "It is absolute y ludicrous, may, borders on unbecility," he may used) with characteristic indignation, "that Luther should think it necessary to tell the Pupuse that Adam and Eve were united according to the erdinance and institution of God " (" Opp. lat. exeg.," 4, p. 70). He invente that Lather's asserting concerning the cutteropt of Catholics for marriage should have left their trace in the Bymbolm Books of Protestantium (Confess, August, Part 16, Nymb Bucher 2, 2 ed. Müller-Kolds, p. 42), and exclusing a Surely it is tens for such Publish to be too funch even for Presentants . Jon. Line (Method. mich ferstauten Beite, aus Lieuch, der Bittlichheit den Kierin, ben, der Ersuièsces Köln ara Ausgang des MA, 2 1911, "Reformations-geschichts. Studien und Texte," Hft. 17, pp. 27-84) has dealt with the same master, but in a more peaceful tone,

Holy Women, applies the words of Proverber! "The price of the valuent woman is as of things brought from afar and from the uttermost cousts. The heart of her husband trusteth in her . . . she will render him good and not evil all the days of her life. blie bath sought wool and flax and bath wrought by the counsel of her hands. . . . Her husband is bonourable in the gates when he satteth among the senators of the land. . . . Strength and beauty are her clothing, and also shall laugh in the latter day. Die hath opened her mouth to windom. . . . Her children rose up and railed her blessed, her husband, and he proseed her The woman that feareth the Lord, she shad be presed "- Elsewhere the laturgy quotes the Bulinust 1. "Grace is posted abroad from thy him," " With thy coinciness and thy beauty net out, proceed prosperously and reign . . . Therefore God, thy find, both anomied thee with the oil of gladeous above thy fellows."

It cannot be objected that the ordinary woman, in the exceeds of her household duties and of a humbler type of virtue, had no part is this prime. On the contrary, in honouring these Sainte the Charch was at the same time he nouring all warnen who had not, by their misconduct, rendered themselves unworthy of the same. To all, whatever their rank or station, the high standard of the Sainte was displayed, and all were invited to follow their example and promised their intercession. At the foot of the altar all were united, for their mother, the Church, showed to all the same consideration and height love. The homourn limit sweet apon the beginning of the number later and are influence on their living assters, just as the Church a "unitying respect for virginity was calculated to exercise a wholesome effect on those bound by the marriage tre, or about to be so bound."

In Luthers own case we have an instance in the devotion he showed an her youth to St. Anne, who was greatly venerated by both men and women in late medianal times. The row he had made to enter the cloister he placed in the hands of this Saint. The liturgs of praise to which we have just astened, and which in bestoired on her in common with other holy apoising he repeated frequently enough as a monk, when anying Mass, and the words of the Holy tabout in proise of the true love of the faithful helpmate he ever treasured in his memory.

The Gradual of the same Mass, taken from Pasim any.

Prov. xxxi 10 f.: "Mulierem Jortem gain incense! !" etc. The Lesson of the Mass De communit nec verymum nec marlyrum Cp. "Werke," Erk ed., 61, p. 207 (Table-Tulk). In his translation.</sup> of the Bible Luther quotes the German verse : " Noug it so dear on earth as the love of woman to the man who shares it?" ("Werke," Erl. ed., 64, p. 113), an connection with Proverba sexu 10 ff. (" Multirem fortem," etc.). In the Table Talk be quotes the same when speaking of those who are unfaithful to their marriage yow in not praying "People do not pray. Therefore my hostens at Eisenach (Urs. o. Cius Cotta's wife, see vol. 1., p. & f., and vol. in , p. 288 f.] was right in

<sup>Paik, op. cit. p. 71.

How well Lighter succeeded in entablishing the fights of the score in which the married state was held in the Middle Ages is evident from several recent attempton of started Protestants.

One Church historian give so far, in his vindration of the Reformer's statements concerning the mediaval 'contempt full for wemaniums," as actually to lay the blame for Lather's entiretion of polygamy on the low, mediaval view of the nature of macrimony." Another theological, a concernative, innessu that he can, even to day, detect among "Romanuta mustic of the mediaval undervaluing of marriage. According to Cathelies "marriage is not indeed forbeides to everyone..... for otherwise where would the Church find new chicken * - but nevertheless is landed at adequee as a terrometry evil . Perfection in Catholic theory commute to absolute agreemence of all that concerns marriage. One advice decision the Church before Lother's day had taught, that ' marriage had nothing to do with love ", " of the ethics, task of marriage and of love not a brace is to be found " to the teaching of the Maidle Aces. An enument worker in the field of the nestery of degma also declared, in a recent addition of his ac-ck, that, before Lather e day, marriage had been "a nort of concession to the weak "; thanks only to Luther, was it "feed from all ecclements of tutelage to become the appear of the exam, as instituted by that his stalical, and the tribool of highest morality ... Such assert one, only too commonly. met with, are merely the outcome of the falor ideas described of by Luster himself concerning the Church of olden days. The author of the fable that unrian and marriage were disdensed in the Middle Ages secred a success, of which, could be have foremen it, he would doubtless have been proud

Two publications by Professors of the University of Wettenbeing have been taken as clear proof of how low as opinion the Catholic Middio Ages had of woman and marriage. Of these publications one, however, a sket on the devil in Andr. Memhard a Latin Disligues of 15:16—which, of the two, would, in this respect, he the most merm nating - has absolutely nothing to do with the mediaval Church a views on marriage, but minriv reproduces these of the Italian Humanists, though revealing that their influence extended even as far as Gremary. It tels how even the dead herself was unable to get up with metamony; muce the difficulties of this state are an great, one of the speakers makes up his raind." never to in arry, so as to be the better also to devote himself to study ". Despite that the author of the Dialogue entered the married state. The other puttication is a discreasing in 1500, by Christop are Schrief, containing a frictile-in withcom at the expense of weeven, himsus due to Italian influence. This, bowever, did not prevent lisbeuri, too, from manne to me when I went to action! there . There is no descripting on earth than the love of war say to the man on whom it is bestowed. [Worte, Lrl ed. 6., p. 212 Lutter's pitr staction of the pirms in manner term with the passage on the . Make fortio , was an in univerand an at empt to prove again the alleged contempt of Lath-Sprum for the love of woman.

marrying.¹ The truth is that the Italian Humanists' "favourite subjects are the relations between the sexes, treated with the crudest realism, and, in connection with this, attacks on marriage and the family". At the same time it cannot be denied that individual writers, men influenced by anti-clerical Humanism, or sectical theologians knowing nothing of the world, did sometimes speak of marriage in a manner scarcely fair to woman and did occasionally unduly exalt the state of celibacy.

Against such assertions some of Luther's finest sayings on woman's dignity deserve to be pitted.

Luther's Discordant Utterances on the Value of Marriage in his Sermons and Writings.

Any objective examination of Luther's attitude towards woman and marriage must reveal the fact, that he frequently seeks to invest Christian marriage, as he conceived it, with a religious character and a spiritual dignity. This he does in language witty and sympathetic, representing it as a close bond of love, though devoid of any sacramental character. Nor does he hesitate to use the noble imagery of the Church when describing his substitute for the Christian marriage of the past.

"It is no small honour for the married state," he says in a sermon of 1580, "that God should represent it under the type and figure of the unspeakable grace and love which He manifests and bestows on us in Christ, and as the surest and most gracious sign of the intimate union between Himself and Christendom and all its members, a union than which nothing more intimate can be imagined."

In another sermon he praises the edification provided in the married state, when "man and wife are united in love and serve each other faithfully"; Luther invites them to thank God. "that the married state is profitable alike to body, property, honour and salvation." "What, however, in best of all in married life," so he masts, "for the sake of which everything must be suffered and endured, is that God may give offspring and command us to train it in His service. This is earth a noblest and most priceless work, because God loves nothing so well as to save souls.""

N. Paulus, "Zur angehlichen Geringschatzung der Fran und der Ehe im MA.," in the "Wissensch, Beil, zur Germanis," 1904, Nos. 10 and 12.

Pastor, "Rist, of the Popes" (Eng. Trans.), 5, p. 119.
 "Werke," Erl. ed., 19³, p. 246 f.
 Ibid., 16³, p. 536 ff.

Such exhortations of Lather's, apart from preshantes of expression, differ from those of earlier writers only in that those authors, relying on the traditional, secretarized conception of the materialization distributions, had an even greater right to eulegen marriage and the blessing of children.

Cathour preachars might quite profitably have made use of the greater part of a westima discourse delivered by Luther in 1531,5 though they might have failed to emulate the love and emphases with which it was uttered. His thems there is "that marriage is to be held in honour"; he quetes Hehr via 4, "Marriage is heriourable in all, and the hed undebted ". he continues: "It is true that our firsh is full of evil lusts which entire us to als, but to these we must not consent, if, however, you hold fast to the Word of God and ere to it, that this state is blessed and adorned, this will preserve and comfort you, and make of it a holy state for you." It was accountry, he continued, and merely to light against any seroual lights outside of the marriage band, but also to cultivate virtue. Conjugal fidelity must be preserved all the more excelully ence "Natan is your turning and your flesh wanten." "Formcation and adultery are the real stains which delies the marriage bod. " . Married persons are embraced in the Word of God." This they must take as their guide, otherwise there Lother a language reason to be a pattern) "the bed is soiled, and, practically, they might as well have passed their motions in it."*

Such an emphasions of the religious ade of matrimony almost gree the impression, that Luther was following an interior arrigation which arged han to counterfact the effects of certain other statements of his on marriage. Doubties he felt the contrast between his worldly view of matrimiery and the higher standard of antiquity, though he would certainly have returnd to admit that he was behindhand in the struggle against sensuainty. In view of the end moral annaequences which even bearing witness against him, he was disjussed to welcome an opportunity to give expension to each emitindate as those just discribed, which tended to justify him both to his listeners and to himself Nor were such meaturement more hypocries, on the contrary, they have their psychological place as a true component part of his pirture. On one occasion Luther bewade the want of attention paid to his excellent doctrines: "The teachers are there, but the doors are nowhere to be found; as with the other purits of our doctrine, there are but few who obey or head us."

Not infrequently, however, instead of praising the dignity of woman and the purity of married life, Luther speaks in a far from respectful, nay, offensive manner of woman, though without perhaps meaning all that his words would seem to convey. He thereby exposes woman, in her relations with man, to the danger of contempt, and thus forfeits the right of posing as the defender of feminine dignity and of the married state against alleged detractors among the Catholics. His false aspersions on former days thus stand out in a still more unpleasant light.

^{4 &}quot; Weche," Wesen, ed., 34, 1, p. 51 ff.

^{*} Ibid., p. 58. * Ibid., pp. 66, 68

^{*} Ibid., 36, 3, p. 274; Erl. ed., 25[‡], p. 6. Warnange as seens heben Doublechen, * 153...

In a sermon of 1524, where it is true he has some fine words on the indulgent treatment to be meted out to the wife, he says: St. Peter calls woman the "weaker vessel" (1 Peter iii. 7); he "had given faint praise to woman," for "woman's body is not strong and her spirit, as a general rule, is even weaker: whether she is wild or mild depends on God's choice of man's helpmate. Woman is half a child : whoever takes a wife must look upon himself as the guardian of a child . . . She is also a crazy beast. Recognise her weakness. If she does not always follow the straight path, bear with her frailty. A woman will ever remain a woman. . . . But the married state is nevertheless the best, because God is there with His Word and Work and Cross."

1

With those who complain of the sufferings of the mother in pregnancy and childbirth he is very angry, and, is one sermon, goes so far as to say: "Even though they grow weary and wear themselves out with child-bearing, that is of no consequence; let them go on bearing children till they die, that is what they are there for."2

His description of marriage "as an outward, material thing, like any other worldly business," was certainly not calculated to raise its repute; and in the same passage he proceeds: "Just as I may eat and drink, sleep and walk, ride, talk and do business with a heathen or a Jew. a Turk or a heretic, so also I may contract marriage with him."4

Matrimonial cases had formerly belonged to the ecclesiastical courts, but Luther now drives the parties concerned to the secular judge, telling them that he will give them " a good hog," i.e. a sound trouncing, for having sought to "involve and entangle him in such matters" which " really concerned the secular authority." " Marriage questions."

^{§ &}quot;Werke," Wesn, ed., 15, p. 420.

^{*} I feed., Erl. ed., 16³ p. 538.

* I feed., Wearn ed., 10, 2, p. 263; Erl. ed., 16², p. 518. Cp. present work, vol. iii., p. 263 and p. 241 ff

* I had., Erl. ed., 6i, p. 205 (Table Talk).

* Cp. the passages in the Table-Talk on marriage and on women, the Works ? Erl. ed., 41 and 42 and 42 and 42 and 42 and 43 and 43 he says, " do not touch the conscience, but come within the province of the secular judge."1 Previously, parties whose rights had been infringed were able to seek redress from the ecclesiastical tribunals, the sentences of which were enforced by Canon Law under appritual penalties, to the advantage of the injured party. Luther, on the other hand, after having accularised marriage, finds himself unable to cope with the food of people clamouring for justice: " I am tired of them [the matrimonial squabbles] and I have thrown them overboard: let them do as they like in the name of all the devils," He is also determined to no the preachers of this business; the injured parties are, he says, to seek for justice and protection "in the latrines of the lawyers": his own conduct, he hopes, will serve as a model to the preachers, who will now repel all who solicit their help.

[&]quot; Werke," Erl. ed., 61, pp. 182-213, and 57, pp. 270-273.

The increase in the number of matrimonial misunderstandings and quarrels, the haste with which marriage was entered upon and then dissolved, particularly in the Saxon Electorate and at Wittenberg, was not merely the result of the new Evangelical freedom, as Luther and his friends sadly admitted, but was due above all to the altered views on marriage. In the new preaching on marriage the gratification of the sensual impulse was, as will be shown below, placed too much in the foreground, owing partly to the functionl reaction against elerical celebacy and religious vows. "To marry is a remedy for fornication"; these words of Luther's were again and again repeated by himself and others in one form or another, as though they characterised the main object of marriage. Plature was persistently painted as excessively weak in the matter of chastity, and as quite captive under the voke of passion. People were indeed admonished to curb their passions with the help of Grace, but such means of acquiring God's Grace as mortification and self-conquest were only too frequently scoffed at as mere holiness-by-works, while as for the means of grace sought by Catholics in the Sacraments, they had simply been "abolished."

LV.--L

^{1 &}quot; Werin," Erl, ed., 61, p. 203.

^{} Briefe," ed. De Watte, 5, p. 25. Cp. Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 121; "Colloq.," ed. Bindsell, 1, p. 421; 2, p. 368. Cp. Köstlinawerno, 2, p. 444.

^{3 &}quot; Briefwechnel," 10, p. 206: " resole . . . who peemen." There are, hewever, some instanous of sympathy and help being fortheoming.

By his patronage of polygamy, forced on him by his wrong interpretation of the Bible, Luther put the crowning touch on his contempt for Christian marriage. This was to relinquish the position of privilege in which Christianity had established marriage, when, following the Creator's intention, it insisted on monogamy.

Birth of the New Views on Marriage during the Controversy on the Vow of Chastity

How did Luther reach his opinion and succeed in endowing it with credibility and life? A glance at its birth and growth will give us an instructive insight into Luther's manner of proceeding.

He had already king been engaged in his struggle with "Popish abuses" and had already set up all the essential points of his new theology, before becoming in the least conscious of the supposed contempt in which marriage was held by the Roman Church. In his exposition of the Ten Commandments, in 1518, he still speaks of it in the respectful language of his earlier years; in his sermon on the Married State, in 1519, he still terms it a Sacrament, without hinting in any way that it had hitherto been considered disreputable, Whether he uses the term Sacrament in its traditional meaning we do not, of course, know. At any rate, he says : "Matrimony is a Sacrament, an outward, holy sign of the greatest, most sacred, worthy and exalted thing that ever has been, or ever will be, vis. of the union of the Divine and human nature in Christ." Enumerating the spiritual advantages of marriage, which counteract the "sinful lusts therewith intermingled," he expressly appeals to the "Doctors" of the Church, and the three benefits they perceived in matrimony; " first, marriage is a Sacrament," "secondly, it is a bond of fidelity," "thirdly, it brings offspring, which is the end and principal office of marriage "; a further benefit must be added, viz. the " training of the offspring in the service of God."a

In his book "On the Babylonish Captivity" (1520) he has already arrived at the explicit denial to marriage of the name and character of a sacrament.

Ber above, pp. 3 ff., 13 ff., and vol. iii., 259 ff.
 Werke," Weim. ed., 2, p. 168; Erl. ed., 242, p. 63. Second edition of the Sermon.
 Jind., p. 188 f. = 63 f.

But it was only in the war he waged against his own yow of chastity that the idea arose in his mind, and even then only gradually, that the true value and excellence of marriage had never hitherto been recognised. The more he sought for theological grounds on which to prove the worthlessness of religious eclibacy and the nullity of the yow of chastity, the more deeply he persuaded himself that proofs existed in abundance of the utter perversity of the prevailing opinions on matrimony. He began to impute to the Church extravagant views on virginity, of which neither he nor anyone else had ever thought. He now accused her of teaching the following. That virginity was the only state in which God could be served perfectly; that marriage was forbidden to the clergy because it was disreputable and a thing soiled with sin; finally, that family life with its petty tasks must be regarded as something degrading, while woman herself, to whom the chief share in these tasks belongs and who, moreover, so often tempts man to sins of meonunence, is a contemptible creature.

All these untruths concerning the ancient Church were purely the outcome of Luther's personal polenues.

His system of attack exhibits no trace of any dispassionate examination of the testimonies of antiquity. But his false and revolting charges seemed some sort of justification for his attack on religious vows and clerical celibacy. From such theoretical charges there was but a step to charges of a more practical character and to his boundless exaggerations concerning the hideous vices supposed to have been engendered by the perversion of the divinely appointed order, and to have devastated the Church as a chastisement for her contempt for marriage.

In the second edition of the sermon of 1519 on the Married State he piaces virginity on at least an equal footing with matrixony. Towards the end of the sermon he (like the earlier writers) calls matrixony "a noble, exalted and blessed state" if rightly observed, but otherwise "a wretched, fearful and dangerous" one; he proceeds; Whoever bears this in mind "will know what to think of the sting of the flesh, and, possibly, will be as ready to accept the virginal state as the conjugal." Even during his ³ "Werks," Weim, ed., 2, p. 170; Erl, ed., 243, p. 66.

Wartburg days, when under the influence of the burning sorrit of revolt, and already straining at the yows which bound him, he still declared in the theses he sent Melanchthon, that "Marriage is good, but virginity better". (" Benum conjuguem, melior virginates"), a thesis, which, like St. Paul, he bases mainly on the immunity from worldly cares. This idea impressed Melanchthon so decoly. that he re-echnes it in his praise of virginity in the " Apology for the Confession of Augsburg": "We do not make virginity and marriage equal. For, as one gift is better than another, prophecy better than eloquence, strategy better than agriculture, eloquence better than architecture, so virginity is a gift excelling marriage."

But this great gift, to Luther's mind, was a moral impossibility, the rarest of God's Graces, may, a " miracle " of the Almighty. Hence he teaches that such a privilege must not be laid claim to, that the monastic yow of chastity was therefore utterly immoral, and clenical celibacy too, to say nothing of private vows of virginity; in all such there lurked a presumptuous demand for the rarest and most marvellous of Divine Graces; even to pray for this was not allowed.

At the conclusion of his theses for Melanchthon, Luther enforces what he had said by the vilest calumnies against all who, in the name of the Church, had pledged themselves to remain unmarried. Were it known what manner of persons those who profess such great chastity really are, their "greatly extolled chastity" would not be considered fit " for a prostitute to wipe her boots on."

Then follow his further unhappy outbursts at the Wartburg on religious vows (vol. ii., p. 88 ff.) consummating his perversion of the Church's teaching and practice regarding celibacy and marriage. In marriage he sees from that time forward nothing by the gratification of the natural impulse; to it every man must have recourse unless he enjoys the extraordinary grace of God; the ancient Church, with her hatred of marriage, her professed religious and celibate elergy, assumes in his imagination the most execrable shape. He fancies that, thanks to his new notions,

p. 242 : "His vergenites donum est presidentius consugio."

Werke," Weim, ed., 8, p. 330 f.; "Opp. lat. var.," 4, p. 353 seq. "Indictum de votes menseticis." Cp. vol. 22., p. 248, §1 "Apol. Conf. Augustone," c. 23 n. 38; Bekenntnisschriften, 16, he has risen far above the Christianity of the past, albeit the Church had ever striven to guard the sanctity of marriage as the very apple of her eye, by exacting many laws and establishing marriage-courts of her own under special judges. He becomes ever more reckless in easting marriage matters on the shoulders of the State. In the Preface to his "Trawbüchlin," in 1529, he says, for instance, "Since wedlock and marriage are a worldly business, we clergy and ministers of the Church have nothing to order or decree about it, but must leave each town and country to follow its own usage and custom."

From that time forward, particularly when the Diet of Augsburg had embittered the controversy. Luther pours out all the vials of his terrible eloquence on the bondage in which marriage had been held formerly, and on the contempt displayed by Rome for it. He peremptorily demands its complete secularisation.

And yet he ostentatiously extols marriage as "holy and Divine," and even says that wedlock is most pleasing to God, a mystery and Sacrament in the highest sense of the word. Of one of these passages Emil Friedberg, the Protestant canonist, remarks in his "Recht der Eheschliessung": "Luther's views as here expressed completely contradict other passages, and this same discrepancy is apparent throughout the later hierature, and, even now, prevents [Protestants] from appreciating truly the nature of marriage"

Every impartial observer could have seen that the preference given to virginity by the Catholic Church, her defence of the manner of life of those whom God had called ^{*} Werke," Weim. ed., 30, 3, p. 74; Erl. ed., 23, p. 208.

* Leipzig, 1865, p. 169. Friedberg adduces passages from F.L. v. Birmpff, "Uher die Ehe; aus Luthers fichriften susammengetragen," Herin, 1857. Falk. "The Ehe am Ausgang des MA," p. 71. Th. Kulda seys, in his "M. Luther," 2, p. 488, that the reformers, and Luther in particular, "lacked a true insight into the real, moral nature of marriage." "At that time at any rate [1522 f.] it was always the second side of marriage to which nature impels, which influenced him. That marriage is essentially the closest communion between two individuals, and thus, by its very nature, excludes more than two, never became along to him or to the other reformers." Kolde, however, seels to trace this want of perception to the "mechanical views concerning marriage." Op Benifie, 11, p. 186. Otto School, the translator of Luther's work on Monastic Vows ("Werke Luthers, Auswahl, taw, Erginsungsbd.,"), p. 199 ff.), speaks of Luther's view of marriage as "below that of the Gospel." (p. 198).

to the cloister, and her guardianship of the celibacy of the priesthood, handed down from the earliest ages, did not in the least imply any undervaluing of marriage on her part—unless indeed, as Joseph Mausbach remarks, he was propared to admit that, "because one thing is better, its opposite must needs be bad."

"Who thinks," continues the same writer, that "preference for gold involves contempt for silver, or preference for the rose a depreciation of all other flowers? But these very comparisons are to be met with even amongst the ancient Fathers. . . . Why should the Church's praise of virginity be always misconstrued as a reproach against matrimony? All this is mere thoughtlessness, when it is not blind prejudice, for the Church did everything to prevent any misunderstanding of her praise of virginity, and certainly taught and defended the sanctity of marriage with all her power."

Luther's judgment was not due so much to mere thoughtlessness as to his burning hatred of the Papacy; this we see from the vulgar abuse which, whenever he comes to speak of marriage and celibacy, he showers on the Pope, the supreme champion of the Evangelical Counsels and of the priestly ideal of life; on the other hand, it was also to some extent due to his deeply rooted and instinctive aversion for everything whereby zealous Christians do violence to nature out of love for God, from the motive of penance and from a desire to obtain merit.

The Natural Impulse and the Honour of Marriage.

Ecclesiastical writers before Luther's day speak frequently and plainly enough of the impulse of nature, but, as a rule, only in order to recommend its control, to point out the means of combating excesses, and to insist on the Sacrament which sanctifies conjugal intercourse and brings down the blessings we require if the earthly and eternal purpose of marriage is to be fulfilled.

Luther, however, if we may trust one of his most zenious defenders, rendered a great service with regard to sexual intercourse in that "he shook off the pseudo-ascetic spirit of the past." He demonstrated, so we are told, particularly in what he wrote to fluglates about the "actus matrimonialis" - words which mure have regarded as offernive- that even that not, shough represented by his opponents as obscene, to the faithful Christian who paretyre it with theakspring (1 Tim. 17 4), contained nothing to race a black or to forbid its mention? According to the "Homan view" it is perfectly true that "the forther materimonisties, in minimum only when performed with the object of begetting children, or to order to fulfil the energyal doc." The, he carlaine, " was formed to be the ede motive of conjugal interviouse. And, coupled with the motive, the act even becomes meritorious! Is there any need of confuting to repulsive a notion * Luther a view in very different. The natural arreal passion was, according to him, the will and the work of God " "The effect of the Roman exaltation of century was to make people heneve, that the inclive of conjugal intercourse implanted by God, via sexual attraction, must not be yielded to, " Take at traction Lather declared to be the one motive on around of which we should "thankfully avail ouncives" of mairimony. This Luther conveys most clearly in his letter to lipsiatis, his interacts friend, shortly after both had wedded. We know no higher conciption of conjugal intercourse.

1 "Die kath. Moral," 1902, p. 116.

This description does not do justice to the medaeval Catholic teach og an mate troop, its daties and privileges. This teaching never demanded the suppression of sensual attraction or love. It fully recognized that this had been implainted in human nature by God a wase and beneficent hand as a stimular to preserve and multiply the human race, according to His con-mand: "Bo fruitful and multiply ! But the Church urged all to see that this impulse was kept nore and worthy by attenues to its higher purpose, trit to the object appointed from above. Instead of hospiring its slave the Christian was to enroble it by allowing the metires of faith to play their part in conjugal intercourse. The Church a teaching would redeed have been " expedience" had it demanded the general represents of the sexual method and not movely the imming of that unruliness which is the result of original win, and as ready unweight of man. Had she imposed the obligation to wage an improvable struggle against it as a thing surefully aidful then her teaching might indeed have heen described no "regulaive"

Ptil it is sufficiently trager that, is mate of the gratification of the emousi impulse of nature playing the printipal part in his new and supposedly more exalted a rest of conjugal interconses. Eather should, on account of the concupanence involved, characterios the "define materiorisms on a quotal one. In "De suce more

On Dan, 4, 1825, "Briefweehool," 5, p. 276. See vol. 111, p. 200. The purpage was omitted by Aurister and De Wette probably because not judged quite proper.

^{*} Aug. ' De bone contig.," a. 6, n. 6; c. 7, n. 6. According to Durate, 1', p. 277, a. 2, the is incolleged briefs the parenges through the Localized "feat.," 4, d.-4, 31, c. 5. He also quotes 3, Thom. Parenge thool.," Supplem., q. 41, n. 4; q. 49, n. 5; q. 44, a. 4. " of solutionary debition reddays."

asticis," his work written at the Wartburg, he says: "According to Ps. L 7, it is a un differing in nothing from adultery and formication so far as the sensual passion and hateful list are concerned; God, however, does not impute it to the married, though simply because of His compassion, since it is impossible for us to avoid it, although our duty would really be to do without is. " We are already familiar with his curious and impossible theory of supputation, according to which God is able to close Has eyes to a sun, which nevertheless as really there.

That there is actual a:n in the net Luther also insists elsewhere, at the same time pleading, however, that the sin is not imputed by God, who, as it were, debberately winks at it : " In spite of all the good I say of married life, I will not grant so much to nature as to adout that there is no ain in it; what I say is that we have here flosh and blood, depressed in Adam, conceived and born in am (Pa. L 2), and that no conjugat due is ever rendered. without min." 5. The beaung which God bestewed on marriage, he says elsewhere, failen human nature was "not able to eccompact without air, "; " without air an nurried persons could do their duty."

Renco the following inference would seem justified: Matrimony a really a state of an. Buch was the opinion, not of the Church before Luther a day, but of hor assailant, whose of pomenta soon pointed out to him how unfounded was his supposition." The ancient Church, by the voice of her theologisms, declared the "actus matermoniatis." when performed in the right way and to a right end, to be no on; they of nitted the mesitable satisfaction of concupatence, but allowed it so long as its gratification was not all that was sought. According to Luther-whom the author above referred to has quite rightly understood-it is different: Sin is undoubtedly committed, but we may, nay, are bound, to commit it.

With the above, all Luther's statements on the inevitable strength of the impulse of nature agree. Though the union of husband and wife is a rule of the natural law applying to the majority rather than to the individual, Luther practically makes it binding upon all. In this connection he seems to be unable to view the moral relation of the sexes in any other light than as existing for the gratification of mutual lust, since without marriage they must inevitably the text, see Denific, 12, p. 203 n. 3 * 1616., 20, 2, p. 304; Erk, ed., 164, p. 541, "On Narried Lafe, " 1522, Worke," Weim, ed., 8, p. 654; "Opp. lat. var.," 6, p. 356. On ^{*} Ibid., 12, p. 114. Cp. "Opp. lat. exeg.," 4, p. 10.

* N. Paulin, "Hist. Jahrb.," 27, 1906, p. 495, art. "Zu Luthers Schrift uber die Minchepf ode"; "Luthers false view of the strialness of the "actus metrimomotos" was strongly repudanted by Catholics, particularly by Chelitoyeus and Cochleus," fall into every sort of carnal sin. " It is a necessary and natural thing, that every man should have a wife," he says in the lengthy passage already quoted, where he concludes, "it is more necessary than eating and drinking, sleeping and waking, or passing the natural motions of the body."1 Elsewhere, in a characteristic comparison, he says: "Were a man compelled to close his bowels and bladder—surely an utter impossibility—what would become of him? "According to him, "man must be fruitful, and multiply, and breed," " like all other animals, since God has created him thereto, so that, of necessity, a man must seek a wife, and a woman a husband, unless God works a miracle ""

Many were they who, during the controversies which accompanied the schism, listened to such teaching and believed it and were ready to forgo the miracle in order to follow the impulse of nature; were ready to indulge their weakness did their state of life prohibit marriage, or to dissolve the marriage already contracted when it did not turn out to their taste, or when they fancied they could advance one of the numerous reasons proclaimed by Luther for its annulment. The evil effects of such morality in the 16th century (see below, p. 164 ff. and xxiv. 1 and 2), witnessed to on all sides by Lutherans as well as Catholies, prove conclusively that the originator of the new matrimonial theories was the last man qualified to reproach the ancient Church with a want of appreciation for marriage or for woman.

Nor must we look merely at the results. The man's very character, his mode of thought and his speech, suffice to banish him from the society of the olden, earnest moralists. Albeit unwillingly, we must add here some further statements to those already adduced.4

"If a man feels his manhood," Luther says, " let him take a wife and not tempt God. 'Puelle propteres habet pudenda,' to provide him a remedy that he may escape pollution and edultery."

<sup>Werke," Wenn, ed., 10, 2, p. 276; Erl. ed., 16³, p. 511.
Sermon on the Married Life," 1522.
Ibid., 12, p. 66; Erl. ed., 63, p. 188.
Ibid., p. 113.
Cp. vol. m., p. 264 ff.
Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 101. Then follows a highly questionable statement concerning a rule of the Wittenberg Augustianable statement.</sup> tinian monastery, in which Luther fails to distinguish between " got u-

"The sting of the finis may easily be helped, so long as girls and women are to be found."

Our readers will not have forgotten the reason he gives why women have so Little intellest it or the reproof addressed to him. by Staupits, !

Luther urges early marriage in the words of an old proverb : To rise early each to marry young will cause regret to no one "

" It will fare with you, " he says to the same addresses, " as with the num to whom they gave curved Jesuses. They cast about for others, who at least were living and pleased their better, and sought how host to escape from their convent ' !-- " What prester service out one do a girl than to get her a baby ? This rids her of many fancism." Here, and clowbers too, he is anxious that people should marry, even though there should not be enough to live upon; God would not allow the couple to starve if they did their duty. "-" A young fellow should be simply given a wife, otherwise he has no peace. Then the troubles of matrimony will soon tarne him."

On another accesson (1540) Lather expresses himself with greater caution about too early matches: "It is not good for young people to marry too sous. They are runed in their prime, exhaust their strongth and neglect their studies." "But the young men are consumed with passion," one of those present objected, " and the theologisms work upon their conscience and tell them that 'To marry young will chuse regret to no one.' Lather's reply was: "The young men are unwilling to result any temptations. . . They should encode themselves with the kope of future marriage. We used to be forbidden to marry in almost all the Faculties, hence the youths indulged in all kinds of executes, knowing that, later on, they would no longer be able to do so. Thus they mank into every kind of disorder. But now everybody is allowed to marry, even the theologian and the boshop. Hence, in their own interests, they ought to learn to mrmet. *14

At other times he was inclined to promote heaty marriages from motives of pelicy, and, without a thought of the digraty of the conjugal union and the respect due to woman, to use it as a means to increase the number of his followers.

tioner voluntaries" and "involuntaries," but which draws from him the exclamation. "All the menanteries and foundations ought to us destroyed, if only on account of them shocking 'pollstanes' ! '

1. Mathemas, "Aufsechn " p. 73, where some improper remarks may be found on the temptation of St. I mul. according to the notes, on account of St. Theola) and that of St. Senedict, whe, we are told, rolled himself in the thorns to overcome it.

See vol. iii., p. 267, m. 10.

* Ibid., p. 122  Nonb.s, men cartain ob us qui lupunaria robust  Briefe," ed. by De Wette, 6, p. 412, undated.

* Mathenius, "Tuchreden," p. 373. To a bridegroom in 1536.

* Werke "West ed. 15, p. 364 f., ket ed., 41, p. 135. Brenden, burg, "Luther ther die Obrigkeit," p. 7.

Mathemus, "Tuchreden," p. 437. * Ibid., p. 219.

This happened in the case of many of his converts from the ranks of the clergy and religious.

In the case of the Bulley of Samland, George von Pelena, and his advisor, Johann Briramann, the ex-Franciscan, who both were descrous of marrying, Luther judged that delay would be disastrous. He urged them to make haste and he publicly wenderly both having already contracted a m-called marnage in economercus; in their cam them was "danger in delay," and, on the anying green, " If you wait a night, you wait a year "; even Paul had east we must not receive the grace of God in vara (2 Cer. vi. 1), and the bride in the Canta is complained that the bridegroom "was gone, because at a had been tardy in opening the door (v. 6) A German proverb and, "Wenn das Ferhel brut soil man den Sock berhalten." Eami's lost birthright, and the toleren words of Christ concerning acparation from Him (John mit 35 () were also made to serve his purpose. " Take it when, where and how you can, or you won't get another chance." A man could not be more of his own wand on account of the snares of the devil; a marriage not yet publicly ratified remained pornewhat uncertain."

Before these exhortations reached them both the parties in question had, however, already taken the public step.

It was as those very days that Lather relebrated his own wedding and sent his pressing invitation to marry to the Cardinal and Elector of Mayenco, telling him that, abort of a miracle, or without come peculiar grace, it was a "terrible thing " for a man "to be found without a wife at the hour of death," It was then, too, that he sent to Albert of Prussia, the Grand Master of the Teutonic Order, who was contemplating marriage, his congratulations on the arcularisation of the lands of the Order and the founding of the Blichy, which he had even previously strongly urged him to do . In this letter he tells the Grand Master that it was " God Almighty," "Who had graciously and metrifully helped him to such a position, that of a secular Prince).". The Grand Master's marriage and consequent breach of his yesof chastisy followed in 1526. He myited Luther to the wedding and wrote to him, that God had given him." The grace to enter the Order [of marriage] audituted by Himself " after he had their support could not be entirely reckoned on On June 2, 1525, "Werke," Erl. ed., 53, p. 366 (* Briefwechsel,"

Hos vot ii pp 11A-28

To lipshoon, June 10 1825, "Brockworked " 5, p. 180 f. Enders (p. 181) would refer the above passages to Lather's new marriage but G. Benert. Theol. Lateraturzing. 1807 p. 691) reaken out a better one for their inference to Polena and Broomach. Two persons at least are chromaly referred to: "Quad ills were protegued, certain seas fore demoins one, station est; mallime one set in many out, disholar potentaments out" etc. Lather evidently felt, that, until the persons in question had been bound to the new Paraged by their public marriages their support could not be entirely recisored on

 ^{5,} p. 186) See val. ii , p. 142
 4 On May 26, 1525, "Werks," ibid., p. 204 ("Briefweelned" & p. 179)

" laid saids the cross [the sign of the Order] and entered the socular estate."

It cannot be denied, that in all these marriages which Lather promoted, or at least favoured, what he had his eye on was the advantage of the new Church system. Of any raising of the moral position of womes, of any deepening of the significance of marriage, there is here no trace, these marriages served quite another purpose. The gircumstances attending them were, moreover, frequently for from dignified. "The Bashop of Samland," so Philip von Creutz, a knight of the Teutonic Order, relates, "gave up his bishopric to the Duke [A.bert] in the presence of the whole assembly. . . . He caused his mitre to be broken up and, out of its precious stones and jewels, he had ornaments made for his wife."1

Practical Consequences of the New View of Woman : Matrimonial Impediments, Divorce.

The readiness shown by Luther to annul valid marriages, and the wayward manner in which he disposed of the impediments fixed by the Church, were not calculated to enhance respect either for marriage or for woman.

As regards the impediments to marriage we shall here merely refer to the practical and not uncommon case where a person wished to marry a niece. Whereas Canon Law, at one with Roman Law, regarded this relationship as constituting an impediment, which might, however, be dispensed from by the Pope, Luther at first saw fit to declare it no impediment at all; he even issued memoranda to this effect, one of which was printed in 1526 and circulated widely. " If the Pope was able to dispense," he said later on concerning this, " why can't I too?" In favour of the lawfulness of such marriages he appealed to the example of Abraham, and in reply to objections declared: "If they blame the work and example of the holy Patriarch Abraham, then let them be scandalised."4 At a later date, nevertheless,

Janssen, "Hist. of the German People" (Eng. Trana., 5, p. 114). Advice to this effect is found in letters of Dec. 22, 1525, and Jan. 5, 1524, both addressed to Marquard Schuldorp of Magdeburg, who married his niece, "Briefwechiel," 5. p. 283 (and p. 303). The second letter, "Works," Erl. ed., 53, p. 364, was printed at Magdeburg in 1526. In the first letter he says, that though the Pope would in all backboard of the letter he says, that though the Pope would in all likelihood reisso to grant a dispensation in this case, yet it sufficed that God was not averse to the marriage. "They shall not be allowed to ourtail our freedom | "

Matheena, "Tischreden," p. 337, in 1544.
 In the second letter to Schulderp. Cp. N. Paulus, "Hist.-pol. Bl.," 135, 1905, p. 85.

he changed his mind and held such marriages to be unlawful. His previous statements he explained by saving that once he had indeed given a different decision, not in order to lead others into excesses but in order "to assist consciences at the hour of death against the Pope"; he had merely given advice in Confession to troubled consciences, and had not laid down any law; to make laws was not within his province, either in the State or in the Church. His former memoranda were not to be alleged now; a certain man of the name of Borner, who, on the strength of them, had married his nicce, had acted very ill and done injustice to his (Luther's) decision. The Pope alone, so Luther says, was to blame for his previous advice—because many, owing to his laws, were reduced to despair and had come to Luther for help. " It is true that in Confession and in order to pacify consciences I have advised differently, but I made a mistake in allowing such counsels to be made public. Now, however, it is done. This is a matter for Confession only."1

When speaking in this way, in 1544, he probably had in mind his so-called advice in Confession to Philip of Hesse. He was still acting on the principle, that advice given in Confession might afterwards be publicly repudiated as quite wrong: he failed somehow to see that the case of marriage of uncle and niece was of its very nature something public.

The multitude of divorces caused him great anxiety. Even the preachers of the new faith were acting a bad example by putting away their spouses and contracting fresh marriages. Melander, for instance, who blessed Philip's accord marriage, after deserting "two wives in succession without even accking legal and, married a third." At Gotha, as Luther himself relates, a woman deserted her husband and her three children, and sent hun a message to tell him he might take another wife. When, however, he had done so the woman again asserted her claims. "Our lawyers," Luther complains, "at once took her part, but the Elector decided she should quit the country. My own decision would have been to have her done to death by drowning."

Bookwell, "Die Doppelche Philippe," p. 48.

In a still existing letter of 1525, Luther permitted Michael. Kramer, preacher at Domitsch, near Torgau, to contract a third marriage, two previous ones having turned out unfortunate. Examer, as a Catholic priest, had first married a servant maid and, for this, had been sent to jail by Duke George his sovereign. When the maid proved unfaithful and married another, Luther, to whom Kramer had attached himself, declared her to be really "deceased" and told the preacher he might use his "Christian freedom." Kramer thereupon married a girl from Domitsch, where he had been in the meantime appointed Lutheran pastor. This new wife likewise ran away from him three weeks later. He now addressed himself to the local board of magistrates, who, conjointly with him, wrote to Luther, pointing out how the poor man "could not do without a wife." Luther thereupon sent a memorandum, addressed to the " magistrates and the preacher of Domitsch," in which he allowed a divorce from the accord wife and gave permission for a third marriage, which, apparently, was more of a success. During the Visitations in 1528 this preacher, who had since been transferred to Lucks, got into trouble on account of his three marriages, but saved his skin by appealing to Luther's letter.*

The reader already knows that, according to Luther, a woman who has no children by her husband, may, with the latter's consent, quietly dissolve the marriage and cohabit with another, for instance, with her brother-in-law; this, however, was to be secret, because the children were to be regarded as her first husband's. Should he refuse his consent, says Luther, "rather than suffer her to burn or have recourse to adultery, I would advise her to marry another and fice to some place where she is unknown. What other advice can be given to one who is in constant danger from carnal lusts * "1. Duke George of Saxony, referring to a similar passage in Luther's work "On Conjugal Life." (1522),4 said in a letter to Luther which was immediately printed: "When was it ever heard of that wives should be taken from their husbands and given to other men, as we now find it stated in your Evangel ? Has adultery ever been more common than since you wrote: If a woman has no children by her husband, then let her go to another and bear children whom her husband must provide for as though he were the father? This is the fruit of the precious Evangel which you dragged forth out of the gutter. You were quite right when you said you found it in the gutter; what we want to know m, why you didn't leave it there." !-

<sup>Mathenius, "Tischreden," p. 374, Jan., 1537.
Lutner's memorandum, Aug. 18, 1525, "Works," Erl. ed., 53, p. 326 ("Briefwechsel," 5, p. 228). Op. Enders' Notes to this letter.</sup>

What Luther had said concerning the refusal to render the conjugal due: "If the wife refuse, then let the maid come," attracted more attention than he probably anticipated, both among his own adherents and smong his focs. It is true, as already pointed out, that the context does not matify illicit relations outside marriage (see vol. in , p. 252 f.), but the words as they stand, to say nothing of the unlikelihood of any roal marriage with the maid, and, finally, the agnificance which may have clung to a course saying of the populace possibly alfuded to by Luther, all favoured those who chose to make the tempting phrase a protext for such extra-matrimonial relations.

When the sermon on marriage in which the passage occurs was published, Duke George's representative at the Dict of Nareraberg up 1522 sent his master at Droaden a copy of the booklet, "which the devilish monk," so he writes, "has unblushingly published, though it has cost him the loss of many followers about here, it would not go well with us your husbands, should our naughty wives read it. I shall certainly not give my wife one."4 Duke George replied with a grim jest which doubtless went the reunds at Nursenberg among those whom the booklet had offended: "As to what you write, George says, " vit that you won't let your wife read the little book on marriage, methinks you are acting unwardy; as our opinion it contains something which might serve even a jealous husband like you very well; for it mays, that if your wife refuses to do your will you have only to turn to the maid. Hence keep a look out for

¹ Works, ² Warm, ed., 6, p. 658; ² Opp. int. var., ³ S, p. 98 seq. De captivitate babylanica.

Ibid., 10. 2, p. 278; Erl. ed., 18³ p. 513 f.
 Due, 28, 1525, "Luthers Briefwechiel," 5, p. 289.
 Dec. 19, 1521, "Akten and briefs des Herzoga Georg von Sachem," ed. F. Gest, 1, 1906, p. 403.

pretty maids. These and similar utterances you may very well hold over your wife."3

In 1542 Weed, in his Postile, speaking of the preachers, says: "The words of St. Paul, 'Art these located from a wife, seek not a wife, i Cor. vo. 27, have a very unavangelical sound on the lips of these Evangelists. How then must it be? Quick, take a wife or a husband; whether you be young or old, make haste; sociald one die, don't decay to take another. Celebrate the wedding, if it turns out ill, then let the maid come? Divorce this one and take is marriage that one, whether the first be living or dead? For chambering and wantonness shall not be neglected," —' bince the coming of Christ," mays the same writer elsewhere, "there have never been so many divorces as under Luther's rais."

ţ

Of the unlooked-for effects produced among Luther's preachers by the above saying, Schastian Flanch, an ex-Lutheran preacher and native of Manafeld, complemed in 1576: "Authough the preachers are married, yet they are so ill content with their better halves, that, appealing to Luther's advice, they frequently, in order to gratify their inestinble concupationes, reduce their made, and, what is even more shameful, do not blush to misconduct themselves with other men's wives or to exchange wives among thenselves." He appeals to his long experience of Lathersman and relates that such a "community superior" had been proposed to him by a preacher of high standing a. Much enries than this, in 1532, Johann Menning, the Dominican, wrote madly, that the state of matrimony was dreadfully diagraced by the new preachers, " for they give a man two wives, a woman two husbands, arlow the man to use the maid should the wife not prove compliant, and the write to take another husband should her own prove impotent." When they feel disposed or moved to what is air and sharreful, they say the Holy Spirit urges them. Is not that a fine tale that all the world m telling about Molenier Myritech of Magdeburg, of Jacob Probat of Bremen and of others In the Sexon land. What certain mothers have discovered concorning their daughtern and maids, who intered to such preaching, it is welves to relate." 4-The name of the ox-Augustiman, Melchior Myritich, or Murisch, recalls the courseness of the advice given by Lather, on Feb. 10, 1828, to the satter's new enouse. (See vol. i.., p. 144.)

* Puntale," Manue, 1942, 4b. Dollinger, " Die Reformation," I.,

p. 52,

* Vormeldung der Unwahrheit Laterschor Clage," Frankfurt/ Oder, 1332. N. Pausa, "Die deutschen Bominisaner," etc., p. 33.

Jan. 1, 1423, ibal., p. 415. Cp. W Patinus, "Histopol. Bl.," 137, 1906, p. 54 f.

Jerusen Person catholics," Colonie, 1880 (reprint), p. 219 seg. Jerusen Person, toron des deutscrien Volkes," 2", p. 454. Several replica were called furth by thus over sealous and extremely anti-Lutheren polemic.

Respect for the Female Sex in Luther's Conversations.

Had Luther, as the legend he set on foot would make us believe, really raised the dignity of woman and the married state to a higher level, we might naturally expect, that, when he has to speak of matters sexual or otherwise repugnant to modesty, he would at least be reticent and dignified in his language. We should expect to find him surrounded at Wittenberg by a certain nobility of thought, a higher, purer atmosphere, a nobler general tone, in some degree of harmony with his extraordinary claims. Instead we are confronted with something very different. Luther's whole mode of speech, his conversations and ethical trend, are characterised by traits which even the most indulgent of later writers found it difficult to excuse, and which, particularly his want of delicacy towards women, must necessarily prove offensive to all.³

Luther was possibly not aware that the word "nun" comes from the Low Latin "nonna," i.e. woman, and was originally the name given to those who dwelt in the numerous convents of Upper Egypt; he knew, however, well enough that the word "monk" was but a variant of "monachus." He jestingly gives to both the former and the latter an odious derivation. "The word nun," he says, "comes from the German, and cloistered women are thus called, because that is the term for unsexed sows; in the same way the word monk is derived from the horses [vis. the gelded horses]. But the operation was not altogether successful, for they are obliged to wear breeches just like other people." It may be that Catherine, the ex-nun, was present when this was said; at any rate she is frequently mentioned in the Table-Talk as assisting.

He could not let slip the opportunity of having a dig at the ladies who were sometimes present at his post prancial entertainments. In 1862 conversation turned on Solomon's many wives and concubious. Luther pointed out, " that the figures given in the Bible must be taken as referring to all the women dwelling in the palace, even to such as had no personal intercourse with Solomon. " One might as well say," he continues, " Dr. Martin has three wiven; one is Katey, another Magdalens, the third the particess, also a concubing viz the virgin bit. 1 This made him lough [writes the earrator, Campur Heydenmuch]; and bendes these he has many girls. In the same way Solomon had three hundred queens, if he took only one every night, the year would be over, and he would not have had a day a rest. That cannot be, for he had also to govern."2

^{*} Cp. above, p. 152 f * Cordatus, "Tagebuch," p. 340. Matheeius, "Aufsrichnungen," p. 252.

Cp., for instance, present work, vol. m., p. 268, and vol. ii., p. 378.
 Mathemus, "Tischroden," p. 281.

He advised that those who were troubled with doubts concerning their advation should speak of improper subjects (" loguerse de neuereis"), that was an infallible remedy ! In one such cose he invited a pupil to jest freely with his own wife, Catherina. "Talk about other things," Linker urges him, " which entirely distract your thoughts." *

As we know, Lather himself made liberal use of such talk to there up himself and others. Thus, in the presence of his greats, in 1637, he joked alout Ferdinand, the German Ling, his extreme this new and his very stout wife who was auspected of raiseonduct. "Though be as of such an irregnificant licits y frame," he says, "nthera will be found to assist him in the neighbal had. But it is & numerous to have the world alled with above here." 1. This leads him to speak of adultareases in other districts.*

A courser take to the one he related about the eases time. A minister came to h m complaining of goddiness and asking for a fernedy. His answer was. "Lass dos Lech daheime, which, so the narrators explain, mount, "that he should not go to such orcom in chambering "1-A similar piece of advice is given by Lather in the degreeol versus which occur in his Table-Talk : " Keep your nock warm and cony. Do not everload your bedy Don't be too eweet on Gertin. Then your locks will whiten plowly "6-On one occasion he showed his franch a turquous (" northerin ,, which had been given him, and mid, fellowing the support tion of the day, that when immerced in water it would make moterrieds " acid safegus evenimal previo cum a vergene in chorse erroum/ertur, " but, that, in doing so it broke ! On account of the many children he had caused to be hegetten from pricets and religious, he, as we already know, is impared himself to Abraham, the father of a great rare. He, has Abraham, was

This was Elasbeth Kaufmann, a niece of Lather's, yet unmarried, who hard with law withowed moins Magdairne at the Black Manustery. The "pastoress" was the wife of the apostate priest Bugenbagon, Poster of Wittenberg, who, during Bayerhagen a absence to Brumwick, werens to have enjoyed too hospitality of the same great become. The "many girls" are Eather's pervants and these of the other inhabitants.

[&]quot; Aurifaber suppressed the end of this conversation. Op. "Works,"

Ert at 44, p. 201 * "Coloq ," ed. Bindseil, 2, p. 221, Cp. vol. in., p. 175 f. Cp p. 179.
 Mathemas, "Tischreden, p. 390.

Cp. vol. v., xxxi., &.

^{*} Mathemas, " Tinchredon," p. 290. Ibid., p. 405 f.

^{. *} Jbed., p. 414.

the grandlather of all the descendants of the monks, pricets and .

num and the father of a mighty people.

We may not pass over here Luther's frequent use of fifthy expressions, which, though they agree well with his natural commences, harmonise but all with the high ideals we should expect in one whose vocation it was to rescue marriage and feminine dignity from the slough of the Papacy. He is fond of using such words in his abuse of the Popush teaching on marriage: At one time, he writes the Papuits make out marriage to be a Racrameet, "at another to be impure, i.e. a sort of merdiferous Secrement." The Pope, who waywordly teaches this and other doctrines, "has overthrown the Word of God "; "if the Pope's reputation had not been destroyed by the Word of God, the devil himself would have ejected him " ('a posteriori), ' Elsewhere he voices his conviction as to the most fitting epithet to apply to the Pope's "human erdinances." One thing in man, he explains, viz. "the "ense," cannot be bound, it is determined to be master and to have the upper hand. Hence this is the only thing in man a body or soul upon which the Pope has not laid his commands. 184

"The greatest bleming of marriage," he tells his friends, "lies in the children; this D G. [Duke George] was not fated to see in his sons, "quos specialisesma principlass causies in luceus edirat." "*

The Pope and his people, he says in a sermon, had "condemned and rejected matrimony as a dirty, stinking state." "Had the creation of human beings been in the Pope's power he would never have created woman, or allowed any such to exist in the world." "The Pope, the devil and his Church," he says in 1539, "are hostile to the married state. . . . Matrimony [in their opinion] is mere fermication."

The Pope, he says, had forbidden the married state; he and his followers, "the monks and Papists," "burn with evil lust and love of formeation, though they refuse to take upon themselves the trouble and labour of matrimony." "With the help of the Papacy Satan has hornbly soiled matrimony, God's own ordinance"; the fact was, the clergy had been too much afraid of woman; "and so it goes on: If

* Ibid., 61, p. 193. The last words are om tied in the two old editions of the Table-Talk by Scinceker and Stangwald.

* I'md., 20°, p. 346. At the marriage of the spectate Dean of Merceburg.

7 Ibid., 25°, p. 373; ep. p. 369 and above, vol. m., p. 251, n. 3.

* Ited., 41, p. 204 (Table-Talk,

² Cordatus, "Tageboon," p. 426. See vol 10 , p. 273. Alum to the is his self-congrutuation above, p. 461, that he works for the increase of maximal, whereas the Paperts put men to death.

of mankind, whereas the Paperts put men to death,

"Works," Erl. ed., 25°, p. 430.

Matheaus, "Tischroden," p. 406.

"Werks," Erl. ed., 50, p. 388.

a man fears fornication he falls into secret sin, as seems to have been the case with St. Jerome."1

He saw sexual excesses increasing to an alarming extent among the youth of his own party. At table a friend of the "young fellows" sought to excuse their "wild, immoral life and formeation " on the ground of their youth : Luther sighed, at the state of things revealed, and said: "Alas, that is how they learn contempt for the female sex." Contempt will simply lead to abuse; the true remedy for immorality was prayerfully to hold conjugal love in honour.*

Luther, however, preferred to dwell upon the deepseated vice of an anti-matrimonial Papacy rather than on the results of his teaching upon the young.

" Every false religion," he once exclaimed in 1542 in his Table-Talk, " has been defiled by sensuality! Just look at the 1"-[He must here have used, says Kroker, "a term for phallus, or something similar," which Caspar Heydenreich the reporter has suppressed.]4 "What else were the pilgrimages," Luther goes on, "but opportunities for coming together? What does the Pope do but wallow unceasingly in his lusts? . . . The heathen held marriage in far higher honour than do the Pope and the Turk. The Pope hates marriage, and the Turk despises it. But it is the devil a nature to hate God's Word. What God loves, e.g. the Church, marriage, civic order, that he hates. He desires formention and impurity; for if he has these, he knows well that people will no longer trouble themselves about God."

The New Matronomal Conditions and the Standered Opponenta.

It is a fact witnessed to by contemporaries, particularly by Catholics, that Luther's unrestraint when writing on sexual subjects, his open allusions to organs and functions, not usually referred to, and, especially, the stress he laid on the irresistibility of the natural impulse, were not without notable effect on the maids of the people, already excited as they were.

Werke, "abid., p. 265 (Table-Talk)
 Park, p. 211.
 Mathesius,

* Post, p 211. * Mathesius, "Tischreden," p. 202.
* For smalar instances of the use of such again see vol. 12, p 231 The Nuremberg MS, of the Mathemai cohection substitutes here, payording to hypker, a meaningless phases. The MS, in the Ducal Library at Gotha, entitled "Farrage" (1551), omits it altogether.

In 1522, after having explained his new views on divorce. he puts himself the question, whether this " would not make it easy for wicked men and women to desert each other, and betake themselves to foreign parts "? His reply is: "How can I help it? It is the fault of the authorities. Why do they not strangle sculterers? "1

Certain preachers of Latheranism made matters worse by the fanaticism with which they preached the freedom of the Evangel. So compromising was their support, that other of Luther's followers found fault with it, for instance, the preacher Urbanus Rhegita! It was, however, impossible for these more cautious preachers to prevent Luther's principles being carried to their consequences, in spite of all the care they took to emphasise his reserves and his stricter admonitsons.

The Protestant Rector, J. Rivan, complained in 1847: " If you are an adulterer or lewdster, preachers say . . . only believe and you will be saved. There is no need for you to feer the law, for Christ has fulfilled it and made naturaction for all men." "Such words seduce people into a godiess kie."

E. Sarcerius, the Superintendent of the county of Manefold, also bewalled, in a writing of 1888, the growing desecration of the marned state: Men took more than one wile; this they did by "fireing to foreign parts and seeking other wives. Some women do the same. Thus there is no end to the descritons on the part of both husbands and waves " . " In many piaces horrible adultery and formication prevail, and these vices have become so common, that people no longer regard there as anful." "Thus there as everywhere confusion and scandal both in match-making and in combrating the marriages, so that hely matrimony is completely disnoncired and trodden under foot." "Of adultery, lewdness and incest there is no end." -These complaints were called forth by the state of things in the very county where Luther was born and died

The seavert George Wicel, who resided for a considerable term at Manefeld, had an opportunity of observing the effects of Luther's matrimonial teaching and of his preaching generally on a population almost entirely Protestant. He writes, in 1016: " It is enough to break a Christian a heart to me so many false Werie," Weim ed., 10, 2, p. 209; Erl. ed., 104 p. 528. On the [&]quot; strangling," ep. vol. (ii., p. 253, p. 2.

" Wie man furnisht witch reden will." ed. A. Uekreley, Lespelg, 1908, according to the 1536 German ed. (" Quelienschriften sur Grech, des Protest.," Hit. 6).

1 ' De soulties mortalium," Bani., Lib?, 1, 1, p. 10 seq. Donific, 1', ^{4 &}quot;Ven werlicher Vantation," Ersleben, 1555, Bl. K. 3. Denifie, P. p. 380.

prophets and herefore fournising in Germany, whose conducting and frivolous teaching fills the land not morely with adulturors but with regular heathen. 4 In an earlier work he had east : "Oh, you people, what a fine manner of life according to the Gossel have you introduced by your preaching on Grace! Yes, they cry, you would make of Christ a Mosea and a taskmaster; they, however, make of Him a promiser and an Epicurean by their sensual life and knavish example." 9

Luther, it is true, had an excuse ready. He pleaded that the freedom of the Gospel was not yet rightly understood. . 'The traines, "he wrote to Margra ve George of Brandenburg, on Sep. 14, 1551, " have now fallen under the freedom of the fiesh and there we must leave them for a while until they have estimated their lust. Things will be different when the Vantation in in working order [the first Visitation in the Margrave's lands had taken piace os early an 1526). It is quick work pulling down on old houm, but building a new one taken longer, . . . Jerusaiem, too, was built very elewiy and with difficulty. . . . Under the Pope we could not endure the constraint, and the lack of the Word : now we remark endury the freedom and the experabundant tressure of the Gospel. 'a Arrient all them charriers Lither found great consolating in contorn dating the anti-Christian character of the Populi Church and Dame a susposed prophecy of Antichrist's somety for woman. 4. His preachers only too sagerly followed in his footsteps.

Courge Warel appeals of the preschors, who, while themselves frading loose lives, used Daniel a prophery against the Catholic view of marriage 1. "They mock at those who wish to remain mingle or who content themselves with one wife, and quote the words of linned. He shall not follow the last of women ner regard any gode," so that anyone belonging to the sect who is not addeded to the pursuit of women, is hardly safe from being taken for Antichrist. The words of St. Paul in Cor. vb., of Our Lord in Mat. 212 , concurring the third sex of the emische, and of St. John in Apoc. xiv., on them who have not draied themselves with women, and, again, of $6. Paul when speaking of the "wides discove" in I Tim. v., don't count a farthing in this Jovinian school . It is an Epscurean school and an Epirorean life and nothing else". With biting intire, in part bin uruforwiedlicher grundlicher Burcht was die Rachtfortigung in Paulo coi," Leipung, 1533. Döllinger, Sid., p. 40.

³ Ana-ciationen nu den Propheten," S. Eisleben, 1636, fol. 88 Döllinger, "Die Reformation," 1, p. 48.

War he " Erl oct , 54, p. 253 (" Brackwachael," 0, p. 103).

 Then us 27 Co. "Werne" Fel ed. 64, p. 135
 Anactationen num A.T.," 2, fol. 194". Döllinger, ibid., p. 106 * The passages referred to are, according to the test of the Visigate i 1 Cor vii. 12: "Qui sene uvore est, vellecetus est quar Domina sunt," etc. Ibid., 36: "Que non varget (vergenem summ) mehtus facit." Ibid., 40: "Bestier erit, si me permannerit," etc. Mat. xix 12: "Suntenmech., gus as spane readens exist pempler requires. Des ... Que paded triplere respent : Aprile: NOV-3 E, of tricks who engine the new song helion the throne "of the result of the controversy thrust upon him, in part the outcome of his temper, he had declared shortly before, that Luthersman was all "love of women," was "full of senseless lust for women"; he uses "gynecophiles" as an adjective to qualify it and speaks of its 'gynecomania"; by this means men were to become better Christians, and he more secure of salvation than all the Saints of God ever were in the ancient speakolic Church. "See there what betan is serious by means of this excited respect for the love of women, and by his gab, feminist preachers in Saxony. Hence his and his followers' encern for women, to whom they cling so closely that they can hardly get into their pulpits without them, and, rather than live a celebate life, the Evangelist would prefer to be the husband, not of one wife, but of three or four."

The list of testimonies such as these might be considerably lengthened.

the Lamb. "He sent, que can malarrina non strat companions, argines en m sent. He sequenter agram quertaque und. He empte mot exhausarbus primare. Les et Agno." I Tun. v. 12, of these widows dedicated to God who marry. "Hestenies daminiment, que primam Aden, triugas ferriest. — Against Javinian St. Jeronae wrote in 192, "Adv. Lovinianum." ("P.L.," 23, col. 211 seq.), where, in the first part, he defends virginity, which the former had attacked, and demonstrates its superiority and its merit.

* Annotationen sum A.T.," 2, 1536, fel. 198', on Daniel zi. 37

Dollinger, soid., p. 105 f.

* "Homilia XXII." Vitoberga, 1532. Denific, "Luther und Lutherturn," 12, p. 278.

* " De corrupte months utringse parts," Ri F III In the title mace the authors name is given as Caccanovius, this is identical title page the authors name is given as Czecanovius, this is identical with Staphylus, as N. Pausis has shown in the Eathork, 1895, 1, p. 574 f.

4 F. Staphylus, "Nachdruck us Verfechtung des Buches vom zuchten Verstandt des gottuchen Worte, Ingelstadt, 1602, fol. 202.

* Op. the quotations in Dentile (1.* Freface p. 15 ff.), commencing with one from H licenses: "By the element that, what formestion and adultery are we not forced to writtens.", also those on pp. 2828, 895 f.

It would, however, be unfair, in view of the large number. of such statements, to shut our eyes to the remarkable increase, at that time, in the immorality already prevalent evers in Catholic circles, though this was due in great measure to the malazanat influence of the unhappy new idea of freedom. and to that contempt for ecclesiastical regulations as mere human inventions, which had penetrated even into regions still faithful to the Church.4 Owing to the general confusion. ecclesiastical discipline was at a standstill, evil-doers went unpunished, nor could moral obligations be so regularly and malously enforced. It is true that favourable testimonies are not lacking on both sides, but they chiefly refer to remote Catholic and Protestant localities. As is usual, such reports are less noticeable than the unfavourable ones, the good being ever less likely to attract attention than the svil. Staphylus complains bitterly of both parties, as the very title of his book proves." Finally, all the unfavourable accounts of the state of married life under Lutheranism are not quite so bad as those given above, in which moreover, maybe, the sad personal experience of the writers made them see things with a joundiced eye.

That, in the matter of ciercal morals, there was a great difference between the end of the 15th and the middle of the 16th centuries can be proved by such ecclesiastical archives as still survive; the condemnations pronounced in the 16th century are considerably more numerous than in earlier times.

On the grounds of such data Joseph Lohr has quite recently made a very successful attempt to estimate accurately the moral status of the clergy in the Lower Rhine provinces, particularly Westphaiss. He has based his examination more particularly on the records of the Archdescorry of Xunten concerning the firm levied on the clergy for all norts of offences. The accounts "cover a period of about one hundred years." In the 18th century we find a quite disproportionate increase in the number of offenders. There are, however, traces, over a long term of years, of a distinct weakening of ecclementical discipling which made impossible any effective repression of the growing eval.

A glance at the conditions prevailing in the 15th century in the regions on which Luke a researches bear is very instructive.

Page 44.

Cp. January-Pantor, "Gesch. des deutschen Volken." 8¹⁴, pp. 278 f., 384 fl., 393.
 See above, p. 167, n. 3.

⁴ J. Lohr, ⁵ Methoduch-kritische Beitrage zur Gesch der Sittlich imit des Kleris, besonders der Erzdiözese Kom, am Ausgange des MA, ⁵ F. Rejormstsonsgrach, Studien und Texte, ⁵ Hit, 17, 1919).

It enables us to see how extravagant and untrue were—at least with regard to these localities—the frequent, and in themselves quite incredible, statements made by Luther regarding the utter degradation of both energy and religious owing to the law of cell-bacy. "Of a total of from 450 to 600 clergy in the Archdescoury of the Lower Rhine (probably the number was considerably higher) we find, up to the end of the 15th century, on an average, only five persons a year being prosecuted by the Archdescour for [various] offences." "Assuming a like density of elergy in Westphalm, the number prosecuted by the ecclesiantical commissioner in 1495 and in 1499 would amount roughly to 2 per cent., but, in 1515, already to 6 per cent."

The results furnished by such painstaking research are more reliable than the vague accounts and complaints of contemporaries.3 Should the examination be continued in other dioceses it will undoubtedly do as much to clear up the question as the Visitation reports did for the condition of affairs in the 16th century under Lutheranism, though probably the final result will be different. The Lutheran Visitation reports mostly corroborate the unfavourable testimony of olden writers, whereas the fewness of the culprits shown in the Catholic lists of fines would seem to bear out, at least with regard to certain localities, those contemporaries who report favourably of the clergy at the close of the Middle Ages. One such favourable contemporary testimony comes from the Humanist, Jacob Wimpfeling, and concerns the dergy of the Rhine Lands. The statement of this writer, usually a very severe critic of the clergy, runs quite counter to Luther's general and greatly exaggerated charges. 4 "God knows, I am acquainted with many, yes,

³ Page 59.

Page 65. That all offenders without exception were pusselled is of course not likely.

I list, pp. 1-24.—For the 16th and 17th centures we refer the reader to J. Schmidlin, "Die kirchl. Zustande in Deutschland vor dem Dreinigal rigen Kriege nach den hischeflichen Diezesanherichten an den Heiligen Stuht," Freiburg, 1908–1911 ("Erisuterungen naw zu Janssens Gesch.," 7, Hft. t-10). In the "Hint. Jahrb.," 31, 1910, p. 163, we read of the reports contained in the first part of the work. "They commence by revealing the sad depths to which t atholic life had sunk, but go on to show an ever-increasing vigour on the part of the sisheps, in many case crowned with complete success."

January care of what with complete access." al.e a. (1506), B 4b; Januar-Pastor, 1¹⁰, p. 681. Wimpleing is, however, answering the Augustinan, Johann Palts, who had attacked the secular clergy, elsewhere he witnesses to the grave blots on the life of the secular clergy.

countless pastors amongst the secular elergy in the six dioceses of the Rhine, who are richly equipped with all the knowledge requisite for the cure of souls and whose lives are blameless. I know excellent prelates, canons and vicars both at the Cathedrals and the Collegiate Churches, not a few in number but many, men of unblemished reputation, full of piety and generous and humble minded towards the poor."

Luther himself made statements which deprive his accusations of their point. Even what he says of the respect paid to the clerical state militates against him. Of the first Mass said by the newly ordained priest he relates, that "it was thought much of"; that the people on such occasions brought offerings and gifts; that the "bridegroom's" "Hours" were celebrated by torchlight, and that he, together with his mother, if still living, was led through the streets with music and dancing, "the people looking on and weeping for joy." It is true that he is loud in his blame of the avariee displayed at such first Masses, but the respect shown by the people, and here described by him, would never have been exhibited towards the clergy had they rendered themselves so utterly contemptible by their immorality as he makes out.

In a sermon of 1521, speaking of the "majority of the elergy," he admits that most of them " work, pray and fast a great deal"; that they "sing, speak and preach of the law and lead men to many works"; that they fancy they wil gain heaven by means of "pretty works," though all in vair, so he thinks, owing to their lack of knowledge of the Evangel. During the earlier period of his change of opinions he was quite convinced, that a permeious relfrighteousness (that of the "limitateril") was rampant amongst both elergy and religious; not only in the houses. of his own Congregation, but throughout the Chareh, a painstaking observance of the law and a scrupulous fulfilment of their duty by the elergy and monks constituted a danger to the true spirit of the Gospel, as he understood it. It was his polemies which then caused him to be obsessed with the idea, that the whole world had been seized upon by the self-righteous. It was his polemies again, which, later, made him regard the whole world as full of immoral clenes.

 ^{*} Weeke," Erl. ed., 80, p. 400 ("Tascherden"), Cp. Lauterbach, * Tagebatch - p. 186 - * Gum memma fleta specialorum," * Bod., Weim, ed., 7, p. 230; Erl, ed., 163, p. 234.

The extravagance of Luther's utterances in his fight against clerical celibody might perhaps be regarded as due to the secluded life he had led at Wittenberg during the years he was a monk, which prevented him from knowing the true state of things. Experience gained by more extensive travel and intercourse with others might indeed have corrected his views. But, as a matter of fact, he was not altogether untravelled; besides visiting Rome and Southern Germany he had been to Heidelberg, Worms and Cologne. His stay at the latter city is particularly noteworthy, for there he was in the heart of the very region of which Wimpfeling had given so favourable an account. Can be, during the long journey on foot and in his convenations with his brother monks there, not have convinced himself, that the elergy reading in that city were by no means sunk in Immorality and viciousness? His visit to Cologne coincided. in all probability with the general Chapter which Staupitz had summoned there at the commencement of May, 1519. Lather only recalls incidentally having seen there the bodies of the Three Kings; having availowed all the legends told him concerning them, and having drunk such wine as he had never drunk before.1

We may here remark concerning Lather's stay at Cologne (passed over in vol. 1., p. 36 f., for the sake of hervity), that at the Chapter them held by Stampets—to whem party Lather had nowgran new—the foremer probably refraised, in his official superity from parting in forms his plane for an amalgamation of the Observantines and the Conventuals of the Barett Province. There is no doch to that Lather came to Cologne from Wittenheep whither he had betaken himself on his return from Borne. After the Chapter at Cologne he made preparations for his promotion. Possibly the project of securing the Doctorate was matured at Cologne. He speaks of the relicu of the Three Kings is a newson of January 5th, of which two accounts have been preserved ("Warke," Weim ed., 34, 1, p. 22; "I have seen them?" "I too have seen them?" In the movabled "Ribelpertokeden" of 1418 he mays shall p. 361; "At takenne [drank a wine quel perservad in masses masses." (which probably means, was so forly that seen after trivialing it he felt a tingling down to his linger (po). "Never in all ray is have I drank no such a wine." (p., for the Cologne Chapter, Kolde, "The destache Augustinertong matter (p. 342 f. and for the same and Lather's Cologne work, Waster Köhler, "Chapter, Holde, En 30; N. Paulin, "Hist pol. Hi." 142, 1918, p. 740; and G. Kawersia, "Theol. Stad. and Krit." St. 1918, p. 348. Buchwald refers to a statement of Luther's on a monum ext at Cologne ("Wertie," Ed. ed., 63, p. 371:- "Timberden," ed. Förstensam, 6, p. 635) in "Weeke," Weim, ed., 34, 2, p. 609.

Two Concluding Pictures towards the History of Woman.

We may, in conclusion, give two pictures which cast a new and lund light on what has gone before.

Luther's standpoint, and, no less, the confusion which had arisen in married life and the humiliations to which many women were exposed, come out clearly in the story of his relations with the preacher Jodocus Kern and his spouse. Kern, an apostate monk, had wedded at Nuremberg Ursula. Tagler, an ex-nun from the convent of Engelthal. On Dec. 24, 1524, Luther joyously commended him as "a monk, metamorphosed into a married man," to the care of Spalatin.1 When Kern went to Saxony in search of a post the girl refused to accompany him until he had found employment. During his absence she began to regret the step she had taken, and the letters she received from her former Prioress determined her to return no more to her husband. persuasion of her Lutheran relatives indeed induced her to go to Allstedt after Kern had been appointed successor to Thomas Manser in that town, but there her horror only grew for the sacralegious union she had contracted. Coercion was quite fruitless. The minister, at the advice of her own relatives, treated her very roughly, forced her to eat mest on Good Friday and refused to listen when she urged him to return to the Catholic Church. Having made an attempt to escape to Mansfeld, her case was brought before the secular Courts; she was examined by the commissioner of Allstedt on January 11, 1526, when she declared, that it was against her conscience to look upon Kern as her husband, that her soul was dearer to her than her body and that she would rather die than continue to endure any longer the bonds of am. This the commissioner reported to the Elector Johann, and the latter, on Jan. 17, forwarded her statement to Luther, together with Kern's account, for the purpose of hearing from one so "learned in Scripture" "how the matter ought to be treated and disposed of in accordance with God's Holy Writ."4

Lather took a week to reply: The Allstedt woman was suffering such "temptations from the devil and men, that it would verily be a wonder if she could resist them." The only means of keeping her true to the Evangel and to her duty would be to send her to her people at Nuremberg. Should, even there, "the devil refuse to yield to God's good exhortation" then she would have to "be allowed to go," and "be reckoned as dead," and then the pastoe might marry another. Out of the scandal that the wanton spirit had given through her God might yet work some good. "The Evangel neither will not can be exempt from scandals."

^{§ 44} Briefwechsel,  5, p. 86.

^{*} Ibid., p. 308.

The unhappy nun was, as a matter of fact, foreibly brought to Nuremberg and placed amongst Lutheran surroundings instead of being conveyed to her convent at Engelthal, as the laws of the Empire demanded. From thence she never returned to Allstedt. Kern, during the proceedings, had declared that he did not want her against her conscience, and was ready to submit to the Word of God and to comply exactly with whatever this imposed. In accordance therewith he soon found a fresh bride. During the Visitations, in 1588, he was charged with bigamy and was reprimarded for being a "drinker and gambler," although his industry and talents were at the same time recognised. Nothing is known of his later doings.²

Two open letters addressed to Luther by Catholics in 1528 form a companion picture to the above. They portray the view taken by many faithful Catholics of Luther's own marriage.

In that year two Professors at the Leipzig University, Johann Hasenberg and Joachim von der Heyden, published printed circulars addressed to Luther and Catherine von Bora, admonishing them now that ten years had elapsed since Luther first attacked the Church—on their breaking of their vows, their desecration of the Sacrament of Matrimony and their falling away from the Catholic faith. It is probable that Duke George of Saxony had something to do with this joint attack. It is also likely that hopes of

Jan. 24, 1526, ibid., p. 312.

Op. Enders on the letter last quoted.

[&]quot;Briefwechsel Luthers," 5, p. 322 f. Hammberg's Latin letter, Aug. 10, 1628, p. 334 ff; v. der Heyden's German one of same date.

Op Duke George's fierce letter to Lather of Dec. 28, 1020 (Brief-wechsel," 5, p. 285 ff.), which was also printed forthwith. He will speak freely and openly to him, he says: "Seek the hypocrates amongst those who call you a prophet. a Daniel, the Apoetle of the Germans and an Evangelist". At Wittenberg you have set up an anylum where all the monlin and mins who, by their robbing and sterner measures on the part of the Imperial authorities also helped to induce the writers to put pen to paper 2. In any case it was their plan, vigorously and before all the world, to attack the author of the schism in his most vulnerable spot, where it would not be easy for him to defend himself publicly. Master Hasenberg, a Bohemian, was one of George's favourates, who had made him three years previously Dean of the Faculty of Arts. He addressed his open letter to "Martinus Luderus," the "destroyer of the public peace and prety." Von der Heyden, known in Latin as Myncianus or Phrisomynensis (a Frisian by birth), was likewise a Master, and Papal and academic Notary at Leipzig. Of the two he was the younger. His letter was addressed to "Khete von Bhore, Luther's pretended wife," and served as preface to a printed translation he had made of the work: "De lapsu virginis consecratæ," then attributed to St. Ambrose . Both epistles, according to one of the answers, must have been despatched by special messenger and delivered at Luther's house. They drew forth printed replies, some of which can be traced to Luther himself, while Eurietta Cordus rediculed the writers in a screed full of biting epigram.

The Leipzig letters, the first of which was also published in German, made a great sensation in German circles and constituted an urgent exhortation to thousands of apostates extranged from the Church by Luther's new doctrine on Christian freedom and on the nullity of yows.

Relentlessly Hasenberg put to Luther the questions: "Who has blasphemously slandered the proua promise of cellbary which priests, religious and num made to God, and which, throughout the ages, had been held sacred?" Luderus. Who has shrouded steeling, deprive us of our churches and convents find refuge" "When have more acts of accolege been committed by people dedicated to God than since your Evanger has been preached?" Did not Christ my. "By their fruits you shall know them "? All the great preachers of the faith have been "pious, respectable and truthful men, not proud, avaricious or unchaste." "Your marriage is the work, not of God, but of the enemy . . . Since both of you once took an eath not to commit unchastity lest God should formshe you, is it not lag a time that you considered your position?"—The greater part of the letter was incorporated by Coefficies in his Acts (p. 119).

* On p. 336 von der Hevden soys : Luther is "beginning to draw in his horse and is in great fear lest his nun should be unyoked."

Nicetan, Bishop of Romatiana, may be the author of this anonymous work, printed in "P L.," 16, col. $67-384 in darkness free-will good works, the assistent and unshaken fath, and that jowel of vegicity which shines more brightly than the nun in the Church? Luderus — Ito you not yet are, you God foresiest man, what all Christians think of your impudent behaviour, your temerity and voluptions one?

Referring to the enerslessous union with Born, he proceeds " The enormaty of your ain is patent. You have covered yourself with guilt in both your private and public his, particularly by your intercourse with the women who is not your wife." In his indignation he does not shrink from companing the exciton to a hatful Venus. He thunders against Lather: "You, a mont, formente by day and by night with a our. And, by your wistings end sermons, you drag down into the abyes with you ignorant smoke and unburried priests, questionable fells, many of whom were already deserving of the gallows. Oh, you marderer of the people!" Yes, indeed, this is the way to get to beneen -or rather to Lucifer's langdom! Why not my like Epirurus. There is no find and no higher sower tenobles about us poor mortals ? Call tipust your new gods, Bacchus, Venus, Mars, Propos, Futina, Poters, Subague and Hymenseus." His wish for Luther a spouse is, that she may take to heart the tourning words of $6. Ambross to the falses must, or as not to fall from the about of a vicious bio into the abyes of eversating perdition presented. I for the devil and he Lutheren angels." And again, turning to Luther: "Hove priv," he says, "on the nun, have companion on the concubine and the charless, your own flosh and blood. Bend the nun back to the cleaning peace and paramos which she foreign . Iron the unhappy creature from the embraces of am and restore her to her mother the Church and to her most worthy and loving brideground Christ, so that she may again ang in unison with the forthful the Ambronum hymn | fees, corona regiment . . . That much at least, val. the dismissed of the min, you cannot refuse us, however blindly you yourself may harry along the sad path you have choses. All the faithful, linked together throughout the world by the golden chain of charity itselfer you will team of blood; on likewise does your kind Mither, the Church, and the kery charge of Angels, who rejoice over the neart who returns pentions."

The writer, who acasons his counsel with so much bisterness, had plainly little hope of the conversion of the man he was addressing his attack was centred on Catharna Hors. This was even more to the case with won der Heyden, a man if lively character who delighted in controversy, even from his first words it is clear that he had no intention of working on her kindling feelings: "Were to you, poor delighed woman," He upbrash her with her fall from light into darkness, from the vacation of the cluster into an "abominable and shameful life", by her example she has brought "many poor, innocent children into a like movey"; formerly they had, as mans, "lived in decipling and purity," now they are "not merely in aptritual but in actual bedily want, may, the prorest of the poor and have become the most despicable of creatures. Many of them now corned a living in "houses of il-fame," they were frequently forced to pown or sell their poor clothing and sometimes themnerves: they had hoped for the true freedom of the suret that had been promised them, and, instead, they had been cost into a "horrible bondage of soul and body." Luther "in his peetsiontial writings had mistaken the freedom of the flesh for the true liberty of the spirit, in apposition to bt. Paul, who laid based this freedom solely on the Spirit of the Lord, as in 2 Cor. iii. 17: "Where the Spirit of God in, there is liberty " Lother a preaching on liberty was one big he, and another was his opinion that the "you of virginity, where it was observed, was wicked and maful, which statement was contrary to God and the whole of Scripture," and more particularly opposed to St. Paul, who strongly condemned those who broke their plighted faith to Christ. Bt. Paul had quite plainly recommended clerical colibacy when he wrote, that he who is without a wife is soliratous for the things that are the Lord a, but that the husband is solicitous for the things of the world, how best he may please his wife (I Cor. Vm. 32 f).

[&]quot; For the full test of this aronymous hymn (incorporated in the Office for Virgina in the Brevincy), see "P.L.," 16, sel. 122...

Your "Sours Lather," he says to Born, "behaves himself very im indently and proudly "; " he fancies he can fly, that he in treading on roses and in "fire mirror. "; he forgets that Gold has commanded us to keep what we have vowed; people gladly obeyed the Emperor, yet God was ' on kerperor above all Emperors," and had still more sight to featty and obsuberce. Was she ignorant of (Trest a saying : " No near having put his hand to the plough and looking hack is at for the Kingdom of God " (Luke in 42) ? He remode her of the severe penalties imposed by the laws of the languer on those religious who were openly unfaithful to their yow, and, particularly, of the eternal pun shirent which a rould move her to leave the "hornd, black monk " (the Augustranus were a black habit, to bewall like "Bt, Magdalene the syd she had done" and, by returning to the corvent, to make "reparation for her inflateity to God." St. Ambrove a bocklet on the fallen nun might lend her, and her companions in inviorture, to a "hamble recognition " (of their mn), "and enable her to fice from the swift wrath of God and return to the fold of Christ, attain to salvation together with us all and prace the Lord for all eteraty ".

We catch a glimpse of the gulf which divided people's minds at that time in the very title of the reply by Europus Cordon. "The Marburg literary melety's peal of laughter over the served against Luther of two Leipzig poets."

^{1 ii} Literarii sodul'ili aqual Marpurgam aliquot cachinus super quodum duorum Lypsienssum poetarum in Lutherum scripto libello ifficm " (Marburge), 1528.

Two satirical and anonymous replies immediately appeared in print at Wittenberg, the one entitled: "New-Zeittung von Leyptzig," of which Luther" was not entirely innocent," and the other quite certainly his work, viz. "Ein newe Fabel Esopi newlich verdeudicht gefunden." In the first reply spurious epistles are made to relate how the two Leipzig letters had been brought by a messenger to Luther's house, and had then been carried by the servants unread to the "back-chamber where it stinketh." "The paper having duly been submitted to the most ignorunious of uses it was again packed into a bundle and despatched back to the original senders by the same messenger."

In his "Newe Fabel" (of the Lion and the Ass) Luther implicitly includes von der Heyden, all the defenders of the Pope, and the Pope himself under the figure of the Ass (with the cross on its back); "there is nothing about the Ass that is not worthy of royal and papel honours." The author of the letter he calls an ass's head and sniveller; the very stones of Leipzig would spit upon him; he was the "horse-droppings in which the apples were packed"; his art had brought on him "such an attack of diarrhors that all of us have been bespattered with his filth"; "If you wish to devour us, you might begin downstairs at the commode," etc. "

We find nothing in either writing in the nature of a reply—of which indeed he considered the Leipzig authors unworthy except the two following statements: firstly, Luther had sufficiently instructed his faithful wife, and the world in general, "that the religious life was wrong"; secondly, Ambrose, Jerome, or whoever wrote the booklet, "had stormed and raved like a demon" in that work, which was "more heretical than Catholic, against the nun who had yielded to her sexual instincts; he had not spoken like a Doctor, . . . but as one who wished to drive the poor prostitute into the abysis of hell; a murderer of souls pitted against a poor, feeble, female vessel." Hence Luther's views are fairly apparent in the replies.

^{1 &}quot;Werke," Weim, ed., 26, p. $39 ff. (with the editor's opinion on the authorship), Erl. ed., 64, pp. 324-337.

^{*} Ibid., p. 540-2339. The writing aptly concludes: "... Inc. vales, cormins lerge notes."

^{*} Ibid., p. 548-234.

⁴ Ibid., 547 = 327 f.

Ibid., p. 544=344.

⁴ Ibid., p. 553 f.=335 f.

The Church, yea, even the Church of the earliest times, was made to bear the curse of having degraded woman and of having, by the religious life, declared war on marriage.

A contemporary, Petrus Silvius, who read Luther's writings with indignation and disgust, wrote, in 1580: "Luther, with his usual hes and blasphemy, calumniates the Christian Church and now says, that she entirely rejected and condemned matrimony."

In what has gone before these falsehoods concerning the earlier degradation and his own exaltation of woman have been refuted at some length; the detailed manner in which this was done may find its vindication in the words of yet another opponent of Luther's, H. Sedulius, who says: "It must be repeated again and again, that it is an impudent lie to say we condemn marriage."

1 "Sermones dominicales des gnadenreichen Predigers Andres Prolis" (with notes), Lespaig, 1830, fol. K. 4'.

" Apologeticus adv. Atcoranum Francuscanorum pro Libro Conformitatum," Antyerpus, 1607, p. 101.

CHAPTER XXIII

FRESH CONTROVERSIES WITH ERASMUS (1534, 1536) AND DUKE GEORGE († 1589)

1. Luther and Erasmus Again

In reply to Luther's "De serve erbitrio" against Erasmus the latter had published, in 1526, a sharp retort entitled "Hyperaspistes," which, in the following year, he enlarged by adding to it a second part. In this work the author's able pen brings into the light of day the weakness of Luther's objections, his distortion of the Church's teaching, his frequent misrepresentations of Erasmus and his own self contradictions.

Luther did not then reply to the work of the chief of the Hamanists. In the ensuing years, however, he became painfully aware that the hostility of Erasmus had lost him many adherents belonging to the Erasmian school. A great cleavage had become apparent in the scholar's circle of friends till then so closely united, the greater number taking their master's side against the smaller group which remained true to Luther. It was in vain that several of Erasmus's admirers intervened and besought Luther to spare the feelings of the elder man. The Wittenberg professor made many cutting allusions to his opponent and assumed more and more an attitude which foreboded another open outburst of furious controversy.

With the art peculiar to him, he came to persuade himself, that the champion of free-will was hostile to the idea of any Divine supremacy over the human will, scoffed at all religion, denied the Godhead and was worse than any persecutor of the Church, he was confirmed in this belief by the sareastic sayings about his Evangel, to which Erasmus gave vent in his correspondence and conversations, and which occasionally came to Luther's knowledge. It is true that if we look at the matter through Luther's spectacles we can understand how certain darker sides of Erasmus and his Humanut school repelled him. Luther fixed on these, and as was his wort, harshly exaggerated and marepresented them. The too-great attention bestowed on the outward form, seemingly to the detriment of the Christian contents, displeased him greatly; still more so did the undeniable involity with which sacred things, still dear to him, were treated. At the same time it was strange to him, and rightly so, how little heed the Humanists who remained. faithful to the Church paid to the principle of authority and of ecclesiastical obedience, preferring to follow the lax example set by Erasmus himself, more particularly during the first period of his career; they appeared to submit to the yoke of the Church merely formally and from force of habit, and showed none of that heart-felt conviction and respect for her visible supremacy which alone could win the respect of those without."

^{1 &}quot;Opp.," ed. Lugd., 9, col. 1249 seq.

Schlagenhaufen has noted down the following remark made by Lather in 1522 when a picture of Erannus was shown him. "The comming of his mode of writing in perfectly expressed in has face. He does nothing but mock at God and religion. When he speaks of our Hory Christ, of the Hely Word of God and the Hely Sacraments, these are mere fine, big words, a shain and no reasty. . . . Formerly he annoyed and confuted the Papacy, now he draws his head out of the nouse "I In the same year, and according to the same reporter, he declared: " Erasmus is a knave in arnate. . . . Were I in good health, I should inveigh against him. To him the Father, So a and Holy Gloot are something hidderoms, Emissions is an sure there is no God as I am that I can see. Lucian houself was not so bold and impudent as Erserans."3

At Easter of the folk wing year Vest Dietrich, who lived in Luther's house, announced in a letter to Nuremberg, that the storm was about to break : Luther was arming himself against Ersemus, rending his books carefully and gathering together his blasphernies. The same writer in a collection of Lather's conversations not yet published quotes the following on bursts : " Erasmus makes use of ambiguites, intentionally and with malice, this I shall prove against him. . . . Were I to cut open Erasmas's heart, I should had nothing but mockerous of the Territy, the Sacraments, etc. To him the whole thing is a joka,"4 5 See vol. 4, p. 242 ft.

Kostlin Kawerau, 2, p. 311.

^{*} Schlagenhaufen " Aufzeie mungen," p. 29 . * Ibid., p. 96 f.

And yet, at that very time, Erasmus, who, as years passed, had come to regret his earlier faults of the pen," was engaged in companing serious and useful works, in which, though not unfaithful to his older style, he sought to defend the dogmas of religion and the authority of the Church. In blacch his "Explanatio symbols, decelogi at dominious precediouss" was assued at Basie by Froben; another important work of the same year, appearing in the guise of an exposition of Psalmixxxiv., contained counsels how best to restore the unity of the Church and to root out abuses. Therein he does not deny the daty of submitting to the Church, but recommends both sides to be ready to give and take.

When Lather's little son Ham had, in his Latin lessons, to study some works composed by Erasmus for the young, his father wrote out for him the following warning: "Erasmus is a fee to all religion and an arch-enemy of Christ; ha is the very type of an Epicurus and Lucian. This I, Martin Luther, declare in my own handwriting to you, my very dear son Johann, and, through you, to all my children and the holy Church of Christ."

Luther's pent-up wrath at length vented itself in print. He had received a letter sent him from Magdeburg, on Jan. 28, 1534, by Nicholas Amsdorf, the old friend who knew so well how to fan the flames of enthusiasm for the new teaching, and who now pointed out Erasmus as the source whence George Wicel had drawn all his material for his latest attack on Lutheranism." It was high time, he wrote, that Luther should paint Brasmus "in his true colours and show that he was full of ignorance and malice.13 This he would best do in a tract "On the Church," for this was the Erasmians' weak point. They stick to the Church, because "bishops and cardinals make them presents of golden vessels," and then "they ery out: Luther's teaching is hereev, having been condemned by Emperor and Pope." " I, on the other hand, see all about me the intervention and the wonders of God; I see that faith is a gift of God Who works when and where He wills, just as he mised His Son Christ from the dead. Oh, that you could see the country folk here and admire in them the glory of Christ 🗥

The letter pleased Lather so well that he determined to print it, appending to it a lengthy answer to Amsdorf, both being published together.⁴

In this enswer, before launching out into invective against

* Ibid., 10, p. 6 ff. about March 11, 1534.

⁵ee vol. ii., p. 249 ff

[&]quot; Lutners Briefwechsel," 9, p. 368 f. | Ibid., p. 462.

Erasmus he joins in his friend's enthusiastic praise of the Evangel which has dawned: "Our cause was heard at Augsburg before the Emperor and the whole world, and has been found blameless; they could not but recognise the purity of our teaching. . . . We have confessed Christ before the evil generation of our day, and He too will confess us before God the Father and His angels." "Wicel, I shall vanquish by silence and contempt, as my custom is. How many books I have disposed of and utterly annihilated merely by my silence, Eck, Faber, Emser, Cochleus and many others could tell. Had I to fight with filth, I should, calumny."

He might, he proceeds, leave Erasmus too to dissolve into smoke like those others. For a long time past he had looked on him as one crazy ("detirus"); since he had given birth to the "vipwaspides" (i.e. "brood of vipers," a play on the title of the "Hyperaspistes") he had given up all hopes of his theology, but would follow Amsdorf's advice and expose his malice and ignorance even if victorious, get dirty in the process. Hence I leave them to revel in their blasphemy, their lying and their

In contradiction to the facts he goes on to declare, that, in his " Explanatio symboli," of 1588, Erasmus had " slyly planned" to undermme all respect for the Christian doctrines, and for this purpose ingratiated himself with his readers and sought to befool them, as the serpent did in Paradise. The Creed was nothing to him but a " lable,"in support of which Luther adduces what purports to be a verbal quotation-nothing but the "mouthpiece and organ of Satan "; his method was but "a mockery of Christ "; according to lum, the Redeemer had come into the world simply to give an example of holiness: His taking flesh of a virgin Erasmus described in obscene and blasphemous language; naturally the Apostles fared no better at his hands, and he even said of John the Evangelist, "meros crepat mundes" (because he mentions the "world" too often): there were endless examples of this sort to be metwith in the writings of Erasmus. He was another Democrites or Epicurus; even what was doubtful in his statements had to be taken in the worst sense, and he himself (Luther) would be unable to believe this serpent even to the world.

should be come to him with the most outspoken confession of Christianity.

All this he wrote seemingly with the utmost conviction, as though it were absolutely certain. At about that same time he sent a warning to his friend Amedorf not to allege anything against Erasmus, which was not certain, should be be tempted to write against him.1 Yet Luther's fresh charges were undoubtedly unjust to his opponent, although his letter really does forcibly portray much that was biameworthy in Erasmus, particularly in his earlier work, for instance, his ambiguous style of writing, so often intentionally vague and calculated to engender accordings.

Not even in Luther's immediate circle did this letter meet with general approval. Melanchthon wrote, on March 11, 1584, to Cameranus: "Our Arcesilaus [Luther] is starting again his campaign against Erasmus; this I regret, the senile excitement of the pair disquiets me." On May 18. 1585, he even expressed himself as follows to Erasmus, referring to the fresh outbreak of hostilities: "The writings published here against you displease me, not merely on account of my private relations with you, but also because they do no public good."4

Boniface Amerbach, a friend of Erasmus's, sent Luther's letter to his brother, calling it a " parson sone epistole," and adding, "Hervagius [the Basle printer] told me recently that Luther, for more than a year, had been suffering from softening of the brain (' cephalæa '), I think the letter proves this, and also that he has not yet recovered, for in it there is no trace of a sound mind."

Recent Protestant historians speak of the letter as "on , the whole hasty and dictated by jealousy," and as based " in part on inaccurate knowledge and a misapprehension of Erasmus's writings."

On March 31, 1834, "Briefwecheel" 10, p. 36.

At the conclusion Lather says of the young people: "Hac leutate et vanstete paulatim desvescit a religione, donce abharreat et penitus profuncscus. And . Dominus noster lesus, quem mini Petrus non tacet Deum, sed in curus viritue seto al certue sum me serptus a morte liberatum, in cuius fide has omina incepi et hactenus effect, qua spoi hostes mirantur, ipos custodiat et liberet nos in friem. Ipos an Dominus Deux noster perus.

^{* &}quot;Corp. ref.," 2, p. 709 : yeperest vdey. * Ibid., 3, p. 69.
* On April 15, 1534, Burckbactt-Bederman, "Boulf Amorbach," 1894, p. 197. Enders, "Luthers Briefwecheel," 10, p. 24.

* Enders, ibid., p. 23.

* Kostlin-Kawerau, 2. p. 3

^{*} Köstlig-Kawerau, 2, p. 312.

Shortly after this Luther expressed himself with rather more moderation in a Preface which he composed for Anton Corvinus's reply to Ersamus's proposals for restoring the Church to unity. In this writing he sought to make his own the more moderate tone which dominated Corvinus's works. He represented as the chief obstacle to reunion the opinion prevalent amongst his opponents of the consideration due to the Church. Their one cry was "the Church, the Church, the Church "; this has confirmed Erasmus in his unfounded opposition to the true Evangel, in spite of his having himself thrown doubt on all the doctrines of the Church. He could not as yet well undertake a work on the subject of the Church, such as Amsdorf wished, as he was fully occupied with his translation of the Bible. In the Preface referred to above he announced, however, his intention of doing so later. The result was his " Von den-Concilns und Kirchen," of 1589, which will be treated of below.

Erasmus was unwilling to go down to the grave hearing the calumnies against his faith which Luther had beaped upon him. He owed it to his reputation to free himself from these unjust charges. This he did in a writing which must be accounted one of the most forcible and sharpest which ever left his pea. The displeasure and annoyance which he naturally felt did not, however, interfere with his argument or prevent him from indulging in sparking outbursts of wit. Amerbach had judged Luther's attack "insane "; Erasmus, for his part, addressed his biting reply to " one not sober." The title of the writing, published at Basic in 1584, runs: "Purgano adversus epistolam non sobriam M. Lutheri."3

It was an easy matter for Brasmus to convict the author of manifest misrepresentation and falsehood.

He repeatedly accuse the writer of downinght lying. What he charges me with concerning my treatment of the Apostle John, " is a palpable falschood. Never, even in my dreams, did the words which he quotes as mine enter my mind." Such a behe can have "welded together" only by pining two expressions used in other contexts.*

As for his alleged blasphemy concerning Christ's birth from ^{} Opp lat. var. 7, p. 526 seq

 * Weeke,* Eri ed., 2.3, p. 276 ff. 4 " Opp ," 3, oct 1494 mg Köstan-Kawerau, 2, p. 603, admits that Luther's charge was " groundless."

the Virgin Mary, Ermmus protests: "I can swear I never such anything of the kind either in a letter, as Luther makes out, though he fails to say which, or in any of my writings." Moreover he was a little surprised to find Lather, whose own language was not remarkable for modesty, suddenly transformed into a champion of cleananess of speech : "Everything, bridegroom, bride and even best man, seems of a sudden to have become obscome to this Christian Luther." etc.

Ersamus also points out that the passage concerning the Creed being a more fable had been invented by Luther himself by means. of deliberate "distortion" and shameful misinterpretation:
"No text," he exclaims, "in sale from his calumity and misrepresentation.' As for what Luther had said, viz. that "whoever tells untruths has even when he speaks the truth," and that he would refuse to believe Brasmus even were he to make an orthodox profession of faith, Erasmus's retors in . "Whoever spoke this bit of wisdom was assuredly out of his senses and stood is seed of hellobore" (the remedy for madness). As to the charge of deliberately leading others into infidekty he does not shrink from tolling Luther, that " he will find it mover to persuade all that he has gone mad out of hatred, as suffering from some other form of mental malady, or is led by some evil months. 111

Lather took good care to say nothing in public about the rebuff he had received from Erasmus; nor did he ever make any attempt to refute the charge of having "lied."

In the circle of his intimate friends, however, he inveighed all the more against the leader of the Humanists as a acceptic and seducer to infidelity.

After Ecosmus's death he declared that, till his end (1536) he lived "without God ". He refused to give any credence to the report that he had displayed faith and piety at the hour of death. Erasmus's last words were: "Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me. I will extel the mercias of the Lord and His judgments. * Luther, on the other hand, in his Latin Table-Talk says: "He died just as he lived, vis. like an Epicurean, without a elergyman and without confort. . . . * Securionme surst, ment stars morrest,* " he adds postingly. "These pious words attributed to him are, sure enough, an invention "a

Most of the above passages from Erasmus's reply are quoted by Enders, p. 26 ff. The outspokes passage last quoted is given in Latin. ın vol. iz... p. 135. n. 2,

Quoted by Köst in-Kawerou, 2 p. 663, p. 313, n. 1.

Colloq.," ed. Bindoeil, 1, p. 275; "Vassi et decesot al Epirareno una aliquo ministro et consolatione. . . . Multa quidem penclara acripeit, habist ingenium prastastissismum, olium tranquillum. In agone non experiut ministrum urbi neque norumenta, et fortosse illa verba ministrum confessiona in agone 'Fils Les miserere mei' illa affirquintir' (p. 11). Luther a words in 1544 in Mathesius, "Technicien," p. 343 He died.

Erasmus, he says,—revealing for once the real ground of all his hatred -" might have been of great service to the cause of the Evangel; often was he exhorted to this end. . . But he considered it better that the Gospel should pensh and not be presched than that all Germany should be convulsed and all the Princes be troutled with riange." ' He refuses to teach Christ," he said of him during his lifetime; "he does not take it seriously, that is the way with all Italians and with them be has had much intercourse. One page of Terence is better than his whole 'Dialogue' or his 'Colloquium'; he modes not only at religion but even at politics and at public life. He has no other belief than the Roman , he believes what Clement VII believes ; this he does at his command, and yet at the same time sneers at it. . . . I fear he will die the death of the wicked "1 After the scholar's decease, Luther naturally desired to find his prophecy Emblishert:

An obvious weapon, one constantly employed against Luther by his foes, was to twit him with his hes; a reply addressed to him in 1581 by a friend of George of Saxony, Franz Arnoldi of Collen, near Meissen, was no exception to the rule. In this little work entitled "Antwort auf das Büchlem," etc., it is not merely stated that Luther, in his " Auff das vermeint Keiserheh Edict," had put forward "as many her as there were words,100 but it is also pointed out that the Augsburg Edict, "which is truly Christian and requires no glosses," had been explained by him most abominably and shamefully, and given a meaning such as His Imperial Majesty and those who promulgated or executed it had never even dreamt of." "He promises us white and gives us black. This has come down to him from his ancestor, the raging devil, who is the father of lies. . . . With such lies does Martin Luther seek to deck out his former vices."4 saine cruz et sine luz 131; here again Luther says he had been the cause of many losing body and soul and had been the originator of the Secrementarisms. See our vol. ii., p. 252, n. i, for further details of Erssmus's end. We read in Mathesius, p. 90 (May, 1540): "The Doctor said: He arrogated to himself the Divirity of which he deproved Christ. In his 'Collegue ' he compared Christ with Pragus [Kroker remarks : 'Erasmus did not compare Christ with Priepus]. he mocked at Him in his 'Catechism [Symbolian], and particularly in his execrable book the "Farragaics."

1 See the whole passage in "Colleg.," ed. Bindsoil, I, p. 272 seq.

1 "Luthers Worke," Erl. ed., 251, p. 89. See above, p. 101.

1 "Werle.," that p. 92.

2. Lather on George of Sazony and George on Lether

The hostile relations between Luther and Duke George of Saxony found expression at the end of 1525 in a correspondence, which throws some light on the origin and extent of the tension and on the character of both men. The letters exchanged were at once printed and spread rapidly through the German lands, one serving to enlist recruits to Luther's standard, the other constituting a furious attack on the innovations.¹

Luther's letter of Dec. 21, 1525, to the Duke, "his gracious master." was "an exhortation to join the Word of God," as the printed title runs. Sent at a time when the pessants, after their defeat, had deserted Luther, and when the latter was attaching himself all the more closely to those Royal Courts which were well disposed towards him, the purpose of the letter was to admonish the chief opponent of the cause, "not so barbarously to attack Christ, the corner-stone," but to accept the Byangel "brought to light by me " He bases his "exhortation" on nothing less than the absolute certainty of his mission and teaching. "Because I know it, and am sure of it, therefore I must, under pain of the loss of my own soul, care, beg and implore for your Serene Highness's soul." He had already diligently prayed to God to "turn his heart," and he was loath now "to pray against him for the needs of the eause"; his prayers and those of his followers were invincibly powerful, yea, " stronger than the devil himself," as the failure of all George's and his friends' previous persecutions proved, "though men do not see or mark God's great wonders in me."

It is hard to believe that the author, in spate of all he says, really expected his letter to effect the conversion of so energetic and resolute an opponent; nevertheless, his assurances of his peaceable disposition were calculated to promote the Lutheran cause in the public eye, whatever the answer might be. He will, he says in this letter, once again "beseech the Prince in a humble and friendly manner, perhaps for the last time"; George and Luther might soon be called away by God; "I have now so more to lose in

Google

Lather to Duke George, "Werke," Ert ed., 53, p. 338 ff ("Brief-wecheel," 5. p. 281, with amended date and colophon). George to Luther, "Briefwecheel," 5, p. 285 ff.

this world but my carease, which each day draws closer to the grave." Formerly he had, it is true, spoken "harshly and crossly" to him, as God also does " to those whom He afterwards blesses and consoles"; he had, however, also published "many kindher sermons and booklets in which everyone might discern that I mean ill to no one but desire to serve every man to the best of my ability."

The letter partook of the nature of a manifesto, intended to place the Catholic-minded Prince publicly in the wrong, if it did not, as was hardly to be expected, draw him over to the side of the innovators.

The Duke replied, on Dec. 22, in a manner worthy of his status in the Empire and of the firm attitude he had maintained so far. "As a layman" he refused to enter upon a "Scriptural disputation" with Luther; it was not untrue that Luther had attacked him " harshly and contrary to the ordinance of God and the command of the Gosnel ": Lather might, if he chose, compare his former severity with that of God, but he certainly would not find, "in the Gospels or anywhere in Scripture," abusive epithets such as he employed, for him, as a sovereign, to have had to put up with such treatment from a man under the ban of the Empire, had cost him much; he had been compelled to put pressure on himself to accept " persecution for justice' sake." Luther's " utterly shameful abuse of our most gracious Lord, the Roman Emperor," made it impossible for him to be Luther's " gracious master."

Formerly, so George admits, when Luther's writings "first appeared, some of them had pleased him. Nor were we displeased to hear of the Disputation at Leipzig, for we hoped from it some amendment of the abuses amongst Christians." Luther, however in his very hearing at Leipzig, had advanced Hussite errors, though he had afterwards promised him privately to "write against them" in order to allay any suspicion; in spite of this he had written in favour of Hus and against the Council of Constance and against "all our forefathers."

He, for his part, hold fast to the principle, "that all who acted in defiance of obedience and acparated themselves from the Christian Churches were heretics and should be regarded as such, for so they had been declared by the Holy Councils, all of which you deny, though it does not beseem you nor any Christian." Hence he would "trouble little." about Luther's Evangel, but would continue to do his best to exclude it from his unds.

"One cause for so doing is given us in the evil fruit which springs from it; for mether you nor any man can say that eaght but blasphomy of God, of the Blessed and Holy Bacrament, of the most Holy Mother of God and all the Saints has resulted, from your teaching; for in your preaching all the heresies condenned of old are revived, and all honourable worship of God destroyed to an extent never witnessed since the days of Sergius (the monk supposed to have taught Mohammed). When have more arts of sacrilege been committed by persons deducated to God than since you introduced the Evangel? Whence has more revolt against authority come than from your Evangel? When has there been such plundering of poor religious houses? When has there been such plundering of poor religious houses? When hours rubbery and threving? When were there so many escaped monks and nums at Wittenberg as now?

"Had Christ wanted such an Evangel, He would not have said so often: Peace be with you! St. Peter and St. Peul would not have said that the authorities must be cheyed. Thus the fruits of your teaching and Evangel fill us with horses and diagust. We are, however, ready to stake body, soul, goods and honour in defence of the true Cospel, in which may God's Grace asset us!"

After urgent admonitions offered to Luther "as New-Year wishes," more particularly to sever his equinection with the number promises him his assistance should be obey him: "We shall spare no pains to obtain the elemency of our most gracious Lord the Emperor, so far as is possible to us here, and you need have no fear of any ill on account of what you have done against us, but may expect all that is good. That you may see your way to this is our hope. Amen."

Few Princes were to suffer worse treatment at Luther's hands than Duke George. The Duke frequently retained by charging Luther with being a liar.

He wrote, for instance, in 1531, that Luther simply bore witness to the fact that the "apirit of lying" dwelt in him, "who speaks nothing but his own fabrications and false-hood." "You forsworn Luther," he says to him, "you who treacherously and falsely calaminate His Imperial Majesty."

Luther's anger against the most influential Prince in the Catholic League was not diminished by the fact, that the Duke severely censured the real evils on the Catholic side, was himself inclined to introduce reforms on his own, and even, at times, to go too far. Such action on George's part annoyed Luther all the more, because in all this the Duke would not hear of any relinquishing of ancient dogma. Hence we find Luther, quite contrary to the real state of the case, abusing George as follows: The Duke was secretly in favour of the new teaching and his resistance was merely assumed: he was opposed to the reception of the Sacrament under both kinds, only because he wished to tread under foot the whole teaching of Christ, to forbid Holy Scripture altogether and particularly to condemn St. Paul; 1 if he, Luther, were not allowed to abuse the Duke, then neither might be call the devil a murderer and a haz. " He is my sworn, personal enemy," he says, and proceeds in the same vein: " Had I written in favour of the Pope, he would now be against the Pone, but because I write against the Pope, he fights for him and defends him."3

Worke," Eri. ed., 253, p. 134.

More in the same strain above, p. 173, n. 4.

Luther, as his manner was, announced as early as 1523 that "the Judgment of God would inevitably overtake him."4 When the Duke, in 1589, had died the death of a Christian, Luther said: "It is a judgment on those who despise the one true God." " It is an example when a father and two fine grown-up sons sink into the grave in so short a time, but I. Dr. Luther, prophesied that Duke George and his race would perish."4 There was, according to Luther, only one ray of hope for the eternal happiness of the Duke, viz. that, when his son Hans lay dying in 1587, not so long before his own death, it was reported he had consoled him in the Lutheran fashion. According to Luther he had encouraged him with the article on Justification by Faith in Christ and reminded him, "that he must look only to Christ, the Saviour of the world, and forget his own works and merits."4 Needless to say the pious thoughts suggested to the dving man were simply those usually placed before the mind of faithful Catholies at the hour of death.

Lather's imagination and his polemies combine to trace a picture of Duke George which is as characteristic of himself as it is at variance with the figure of the Duke, as recorded in history. He accused the Duke of misgovernment. and tyreany and incited his subjects against him; and, in his worst fit of indignation, launched against the Duke

<sup>Werke," Erl. ed., 58, p. 411, Table-Talk.
Ibid., 31, p. 250 ff.
To the Elector Frederick of Saxony, March 5, 1522, "Werke," Erl ed., 53, p. 67 ("Buefwechsel" 3, p. 266).
Werke, "Erl ed., 61, p. 343 f. Table-Talk.
Werke, "Erl ed., 61, p. 343 f. Table-Talk.</sup>

^{*} Had, 58, p. 412 (Table Talk), where Lather bases has tale on a remark of the Protestant Elector Johann Frederick of Saxony.

the booklet "Widder den Meuchler zu Dreien" (1581). 1 Yet the Saxons generally did not regard the Duke's government as tyrannical or look upon him as an "assassin," not even the Lutherans who formed the majority. On the contrary, they were later on to acknowledge, that, under the Duke's reign, they had enjoyed " prosperity and peace " with the Emperor, amongst themselves and with their neighbours. His firmness and honour were no secret to all who knew him. The King of France admired his disinterestedness, when, in 1582, he rejected the proffered yearly pension of at least 5000 Guiden which was to detach him from the Empire. At the Diet of Worms this Catholic Duke had been the most outspoken in condemning the proposal made, that Luther should be refused a safe conduct for his return journey; he pointed out how much at variance this was with German ways and what a lasting sharie it would bring on the German Princes. As for the rest he favoured the use of atrong measures to safeguard Germany from religious and political revolution. He also befriended, more than any other German Prince or Bishon, those scholars who attacked Luther in print.

After the appearance of the libel "Widder den Meuchler so Dresen," he wrote a reply entitled "About the insulting booklet which Martin Luther has published against the Dresden murderer," though it was issued in 1581, not under his own name, but under that of Franz Arnoldi.1

The work is more a vindication of the Empire's Catholic standpoint and of the honour of the Catholics against Luther's foul suspicions and calumnies, than a personal defence of his own cause. It is couched in the language we might expect from a fighter and a sovereign pelted with flith before the eyes of his own subjects. It hails expressions of the roughest against Luther, the convicted " rebel against the Emperor and all authority," the inventor of "shrmy fabrications and palpable lies" not worth an answer, amongst which was the "downright false" assertion, that "the Papists are up in arms" against the Protestant Estates.* In order to understand its tone we must bear in mind Luther's own method of belabouring all his fees with the coarsest language at his command.

Google

J. P. 135.

^{4 &}quot; Werke," Weim, ed., 20, 2, p. 413 ff., Ed., ed., 253, p. 100 ff. See our vol. 11., p. 295 f.

1 " Luthers Works," Ert. ed., 25', p. 129 ff.

At the beginning of his writing the Dake mys of Lather's abuse. "If both Latherens and Papets reald he referred by vitaperation and chase, curring and swearing, then His Importal Roman Majority, Christian hiegs, princes and lords would have had no next of a scholar, plenty other propin, for matanes, with-out whites tipsy biors and louis known, might have done it just as well without any amistance or hap of yours."

The following, taken from the Duke a writing, carries us back into the very thick of the excitement of three years :

"Who is the man who, contrary to God, law, pustice and all Respirate and innumbers, has exercisquently related, states and taken from Christ oil the possessions bestored upon Hanhundreds of years ago by emperors, kings, princes, lords, counts, houghts, notice, burgiers and personts, all of whom, out of fervent love and ap ever about for His sacred Passies. His may blood and guildess coath, gave their gifts for the establishment of monasterios, parish churches nitars, cells hospitals, mortuanes, guilds, roods, etc., etc., f. Why Square Martin, Dr. Luther !-Who has plundered and despeded the poor village elergy-who were true pastors of the Church, minuters of the Secremonia, preachers and guides of sours—of their board and sweat, their backly earned yearly steperal, may, their eacred gifus such as either, forta, offer age and Church dues, and that without any permission of the Ordinaries and contrary to God, to honeur and to justice? Why. Dr. Pig trough Luther! - Who has robbed, phindered and deprived took during the last twelve years of so many thousand arch and wet there down with bondy boads to lander in the above of hell t. Who, but the each murderer of souls, Dr. Donary-ear Mortem Lather. —Who has robbed Christ. of Harweckled speakers, many of whom, though purhaps not all) had served Him. Idigently day and night for so many years in a levely, spirit sal big and has brought them down to a succession, pitis its and wicked mixto of life? Shame spins you, you blasphonous, earth-gour man, you public hordsfor for all excepted tranks and same, appointed provide and renegates generally ! --Who has fliched, recited and atoles from his Imperial Roman Majorty, our brievest, innicent, Christian Prince Charles V., and from lange, princes and lards, the homour, respect, service, obschoors and the plighted outh of their subjects (not of all, there (rod) by false, estimate and demoable writings and doctries ? Why sure, Dr. Luther !- Who has made so trany this you and aroundeels as are now to be found in every corner, amongst them so many russaray modes on that in many places, on I hear, one is not anio from them either in the streets or at home t. Why, Dr. Luther t. That nothing might be left undoes, he has also destroyed the religious houses of nume. — Summer summaram, there would be so much to test, that, for the cake of bresity at result stack as the percent, a Hut I will about you from S refuse who was the first, the swood and the third sarriegous robber. The first was Largier, who, out of profe, tried to rob the Almighty of His glory, power, praise and service (Is. xiv. 12). He received his reward. The second was Aman, who stole from God the highest honour, viz. worship, for, in his mailee, he caused himself to be worshipped as God. He was hanged on a gallows 50 ells high. Judas Scanothis stole from Christ and His Apostles the tenth penny of their daily living, he hanged himself. Luther, the fourth sacrilegious robber, has surpassed all men in iniquity; what his end and reward will be God alone knows."

It has been said, that, among the defenders of Catholicism, no voice was raised which could compare in any way in emphasis and power with that of Luther. Döllinger in later life considered that, in comparison with Luther, his opponents could only "stammer"; what they advanced sounded "feeble, weak and colourless." Yet, what we have just quoted from Duke George cannot in fairness be charged with weakness. Their indignation and fiery zeal inspired other Catholics too to express with eloquence and rudeness their conviction of the evil consequences of Luther's action.

¹ P. 144. ¹ "Wiedervereinigung der christi. Kirchen," p. 53.

CHAPTER XXIV

MORAL CONDITIONS ACCOMPANYING THE REFORMATION PRINCELY PATRONS

1. Reports from various Lutheran Districts

AFTER Duke George of Saxony had been carried off by death on April 17, 1589, a sudden revulsion in favour of Lutheranism took place in his land. Duke Henry, his brother, who succeeded him, introduced the new teaching to which he had long been favourable. Luther came at once to Leipzig with Melanchthon, Jonas and Cruciger to render at least temporary assistance, by preaching and private counsel. In July of that same year an Evangelical Visitation was already arranged by Duke Henry on the lines of that in the Saxon Electorate; this was carried out by Luther's preachers.

Many abuses dating from Catholic times were prevalent amongst both people and parochial clergy. Concubinage in particular had increased greatly in the clerical ranks under the influence of the new ideas. Luther himself boasted of having advised "several parish-prests under Duke George to marry their cook secretly." But much greater disorders than had previously existed crept in everywhere at the commencement of the change.

Luther b meelf was soon at a loss to discover any religious spirit or zeal for exclusionatical affairs, either in the ruler or in his councillors. The Duke seemed to him "old, feeble and incapable." He complained, on March 3, 1540, to his friend Anton Lauterbach, then minuter at Pirns: "I see well enough, that, at the Dresden Court there is an extraordinary unwillingness to advance the cause of God or man; there pride and greed of gain reign supreme. The old Prince can't do anything, the younger Princes does not, and would not even had they the courage. May God keep the guidance of His Church in His own Hands until He finds suitable tools." On the moral conditions at the Ducal Court he passes a starting and hasty judgment when he says, writing to his Elector in 1540, that there the "scandals were ten times worse" than those caused by the Homan bigsmy. He was annoyed to find that, even after the introduction of the new teaching, the courtiers and nobles thought only of replemening their pursos. He speaks of them as the "anatogratic harpies of the land," and exclaims: "These courtiers will end by eating themselves up by their own avaries." They refused to support the minusters of the Word and disputed amongst themselves as to whose duty it was to do so; they did not hide their old contempt for Wittenberg, i.e. for its theologians and theology, and yet they expected Wittenberg to carry out the Vantations free of cost. "Even should you get nothing for the Vantation," he nevertheless instructs one of the peachers, "still you must hold it as well as you can, comfort souls to the heat of your power and, in any case, expel the possenous Papista."

¹ Above, p. 38, and vol. m., p. 262. ¹ Letters od. De Wette, 5, p. 271

The unexpected and apparently so favourable change in the Duchy really did little to dispel his gloom, though he occasionally intones a hymn of gratitude and admiration for the working of Providence displayed in the change of rulers.

About this time (1539), in Brandenburg, the Elector Josephin II, also ushered in the innovations. The rights and possessions of the ancient Church fell a prey to the apollers. Luther praised the ruler for going forward so bravely "to the welfare and salvation of many souls." He was, however, apprehensive lest the "roaming of the hon in high places" might influence the Elector; with the Divine assistance, however, he would not fear even this . He showed himself strangely lement in regard to the Elector's prudent retention of much more of the Catholic ceremonial than had been preserved in any other German land. Even the Elevation of the Sacrament at Mass (or rather at the tham Mass still in use) was tolerated by Luther; he writes: "We had good reasons for doing away with the elevation [of the Sacrament] here at Wittenberg, but perhaps at Berlin you have not."4

³ To Johannes Collarus, minuter at Dreaden, Nov. 26, 1540, Letters ed. De Wette, 5, p. 229.

Ibid., cp. the letter to Wenceslaus Link of Oct. 26, 1539, "Brillwohms," 13, p. 279; "Process veteri adso despissant Hattenbergam."
Letter of Dec. 4, 1530, "Briefwecheel," shid., p. 313.

* To Provest George Backholzer at Berlin, Dec. 4, 1630, ibid., p. 214. At the Wittenberg Schoonlarche the elevation had gone before 1639, and some after was discontinued throughout the basic Electorate. It was retained, however, in the parents church of Wittenberg until

In the Duchy of Prussia, formerly ecclesiastical property of the Teutonic Knights, the way had been paved for the apostasy of these Knights, all bound by the vow of chastity, by Luther's alluring tract " An die Herrn Deutschs Ordens. das sie falsche Keuscheyt meyden und auf rechten ehlichen Keuscheyt greyffen."1 Albert, the Grand Master, who had visited Luther twice, as already narrated, seized upon the lands of the Order belonging to the Church and enused himself to be solemnly invested and proclaimed hereditary Duke of Prussia on April 10, 1825; thereupon Lather sent him his congratulations that God should have so graciously called him to this new Estate. The Grand Muster, himself a married man, with the assistance of the two apostate Bishops of Samland and Pomerania, then established Lutherwaism. As chief Bishop he assumed the position of head of the territorial Church, agreeably with the Protestant practice in the other German lands. The episcopal jurisdiction was transferred to the civil Consistorial Courts.

Violent appropriation of alien property, as well as illegal assumption of ecclematical jurisdiction, also characterized the advent of the new faith in Wurtemberg. Duke Ulrich. who had been maned to the throne in 1534 by a breach of the peace of the Empire and contrary to all law and justice, thanks to the successful raid of Philip of Hesse (above, p. 47; vol. m., p. 67 f.), continued to labour under the stigma. attaching to the manner in which he had obtained the Durhy, in spite of the peace he had patched up with the Emperor. The religious transformation of the country was however, soon accomplished, thanks to his pressure.

The chief part in this, so far as Upper Wurtemberg was concerned, devolved on the preacher, Ambrosius Blaurer (Blaser), who favoured the Zwinghan leanings of Bucer.

Blaurer was openly accused of deception and hypocrasy in the matter of his profession of facts. Though he had formerly sided with Zwingli in the denial of the Sacrament, he vindicated his Latheran orthodoxy to his patron, the Duke, by means of a Dugenhagen chil away with it on June 25, 1542. Luther reserved to h need the liberty of controducing it should hereby or other reasons call for it. He had retained the elevation at Wittenberg for a while as a project against Carlstadt's attacks on the Secrement, at least such was the ressure he gave its May, 1942, to Lassigrave Platin, who wanted its abrogation. Cp. Kistir Kawersu, 2, p. 572.

1 Dec., 11.3, Work, "Wein ed., 12, p. 232 ff; Erl. ed., 19, p. 16 ff. ("Briefwechiel," 4, p. 206).

formulary! tallying with Luther's doctrine on the Supper. Subsequently, however, he sensed an "Apology," in which he declared he had not in the least altered his views. "Who does not see the deception ?" wrote Luther's friend, Veit Districh; "formerly he made a profession of faith in our own words, and now he attacks everybody who says he has retracted his previous opinion." Luther had been a prey to the greatest anxiety on learning that Bluures had become the Duke's favourite. " If this be true," he wrote, " what hope is left for the whole of Upper Germany ? "1 Much as he had rejoiced at Blaurer's apparent retractation in the matter of the Sacrament, he was very mutrustful of his bewildering " Apology " " I only hope it be meant seriously," he declared; " t seancialises many that Blaurer should be so anxious to make out that he never thought differently. People find this hard to believe." "For the sake of unity I shall, however, put a favourable interpretation on everything. I am ready to forgive anyons who is his heart this is anglet, even though he may have been in error or hostile to me." 4. Thus he practically pledged himself to alence regarding the work.

Of "Blazer's" doings in Wartemberg now won over to the new Evangel, the Bavarian agent, Hans Worner, a violent opponent of Duke Uirsch's, wrote: "He preaches every day; yet none save the low classes and common people, etc., attend. his sermons, for these readily accept the Evangel of mine being thirm and thine mine. Item, Blarer has full powers, writes hither and thither in the land, turns out here a provost, there a canon, vicus, rector or priest and banishes them from the country. by order of Duke Ulrich, he appoints foreigners, Zwinghans or Lutherny scamps, of whom no one knows anything; all must have wife and child, and if there be still a prest found in the land, be in forced to take a wife." It

In the Würtemberg lowlands, north of Stuttgart, a zealous Lutherars, Erhard Schnepf, laboured for the destruction of the old Church system; Duke Ulrich also summoned Johann Brens, the Schwabisch-Hall preacher, to his land for two years

At Christmas, 1585, Ulrich gave orders to all the prelates in his realm to dismiss the Catholic clergy in their districts and appoint men of the new laith, as the former "did nothing but blaspheme and abuse the Divine truth." Even

Cp. Endors, iòid., 10, p. 18, n. 7.

^{*} Letter to Color, April 30, 1635. Enders, field, p. 151, n. 5.

* To Justus Jonas, Dec. 17, 1634, "Briefwecheel," 10, p. 95

* To Erhard Schnepi at Stuttgart, May 15, 1535, and , p. 150.

* Letter to the Chanceller Leonard v. Eck, Jan. 2., 1535, m Wille,

"Anal, sur Gesch. Oberdeutschlands, 1534–1540" ("Zestache für die Gusch, des Oberrheim," 37, p. 243 ft.), p. 293 f.

G. Bosset in "Württeinberg, KG," ed. Calwer Verlagsverein. Calw., 1893, p. 535.

the assisting at Mass in neighbouring districts was prohibited by the regulation issued in the summer of 1586. which at the same time prescribed the attendance of Catholics at least once every Sunday and Holiday at the preaching of the new ministers of the Word; under this intolerable system of compulsion Catholics were reduced to performing all their religious exercises in their riwa homes.1 The violent suppression of the monasteries and the sequestration of monastic property went hand in hand with the above. In the convents of women, which still existed the nunwere forced against their will to listen to the sermons of the preachers. Church property was everywhere confiscated so far as the ancient Austrian law did not prevent it. The public needs and the scarcity of money were alleged as pretexts for this robbery. The Mass vestments and church vessels were allotted to the so-called poor-boxes. At Stuttgart, for instance, the costly church vestments were sold for the benefit of the poor. In the troubles many noble works of art perished, for "all precious metal was melted down and minted, nor were cases of embezzlement altogether unknown." "The Prince, with the approach of old age. manifested pitiable miscrimess and cupidity." Unfortunately he was left a free hand in the use of the great wealth that poured into his coffers. But, not even in the interests of the new worship, would be expend what was necessary, so that the vicarages fell into a deplorable state. In other matters, too, the new Church of the country suffered in consequence of the way in which Church property. was handled. " The inevitable consequence was the rise of many quarrels, complaints were heard on all sides and even the Schmalkalden League was moved to remonstrate with Ulrich.

Temble details concerning the alienation of church and monastic property are reported from Wurternberg by contemporance. The preacher Erhard Schnepf, the Duke's chief tool, was also his right hand in the seizure of property. Loud complaints concerning behinepf's deings, and demands that he should be made to render an account, were raised even by such Protestants as Bucer and Myconius, and by the speakers at the religious conference at Worms. He found means, however, to evade this duty. One of those voices of the pest bewails the treatment meted out to the unfortunate religious: "Even were the Würtemberg monits and nums all devils incarnate and no men, still Duke Uirch ought not to proceed against them in so un-Chressen, inhuman and tyranmosi a fashion."

Cp. ibid., p. 338. J. Ibid., p. 347. J. Ibid., p. 348.

The releations work of religious subversion bore everywhere a positical stamp. The leaders were simply tools of the Court. Frequently they were at variance amongst themselves in matters of theology, and their people, too, were dragged into the controversy. To the magistrates it was left to decide such differences unless indeed some dictatorial official forestalled them, as was the ense when the Vogt of Herrenberg took it into his own hands to settle a matter of faith. In the struggles between Lutherans and Zwinghans, the highest court of appeal above the town-Councillors and the officials was the Ducal Chancery.

Ulrich himself did not expiscitly side either with the Confession of Augsburg or with the "Confessio Tetra-politicus," viz. with the more Zwinglian form of faith agreed upon at the Diet of Augsburg by the four South-German townships of Strasburg, Constance, Memmingen and Lindau.

The preschere who assembled in 1637 at the so called Idele meeting of Urach, to discuss the question of the represent of images which had given rise to serious disseptions amongst them, appealed to Ulrich. Blaurer invested against the sea of images as identrous. Brent declared that their removal is Wurtemberg would be tantameent to a condemnation of the Lutherna Church in baxony and essewhere where they were permitted. The Court, to which the majority of the theologisms appealed, ordered the removal of all images on Jan. 30, 1540. Distressing terries were witnessed in many places when the images and pictures in the churches, which were not only prized by the people, but were also, many of them, of great artistic value,* were broken and torn to pieces in spite of the warning imaged by the authorities against their violent destruction. The "Tatro-position " had already formily denounced the use of images."

At Ulm, which so far had refused to achors to the Confusions," the magnetrates in 1644 decided to achors to the Confusion of Augsburg and the "Apologia." Blauver, some years before (1641), had justifiably complianed of the arbitrary action of the either authorities and said that every town acted according to its own ideas. But the preachers were frequently so exceptions in the material demands they made on belief of thermelves and their families that the Town Council of Ulm declared, they behaved as though "each one had the right to receive a hid sancepan every day."

Hans Werner to Chanceller Eck, Jan. 14, 1834, Wille, shid., p. 294.
 Bowert, shid., remarks, p. 333 * Many rectinival works of art were preserved."
 Ibid., p. 356.

In place of any amendment of the many moral deordow already prevailing, still greater moral corruption became the rule among the people of Wartemberg, as a streeted by Myconius the Zwinghan in 1839, and thirty years later by the Chancellar of the University of Tübingen, Jacob Andreas.

The former declared that the "people are full of impudence and godienment; of blaspheny, drunkenness, one of the flesh and wild licentiousness there is no end". Andrew directly connects with the new faith this growing demorshastion: "A devolute, Epicurena, bestial life, feeding, swilling, avarice, pride and biaspheny." "We have learnt," so the people said, according to him, "that only through faith in Jeans Christ are we saved, Who by His death has stoned for all our sins.... that all the world may see they are not Papists and rely not at all on good works, they perform none. Instead of fasting they gorge and swill day and night, instead of giving alms, they flay the poor." "Everyone admits this cannot go on longer for things have come to a cross. Amongst the people there is little fear of God and little or no verseity or faith—all forms of injustice have increased and we have reached the limit."

A General Rescript had to be assued on May 22, 1542, for the whole of Wiirtemberg to check "the drunkenness, blaspheny, swearing, ghittony, conneces and quarrelapmeness rampant in the parahea."1

Few bright spots are to be seen in the accounts of the early days of the Reformation in Würtemberg, if we except the lives of one or two blameless ministers. It is no fault of the historian's that there is nothing better to chronicle. Even the Protestant historians of Wurtemberg, albeit predisposed to paint the change of religion in bright colours, have to admit this. They seek to explain the facts on the score that the period was one of restless and seething transition, and to throw the blame on earlier times and on the questionable elements among the Catholic elergy from whose ranks most of the preachers were recruited.4 But though grave responsibility may rest on earlier times, not only here but in the other districts which fell away from the Church, and though those of the elergy who forgot their duty and the honour of their culling may have contributed. even more than usual to damage the fair reputation of

In Hoyd, "Ulach Herzog von Wärtenberg," 3, p. 29.

⁴ Thus, e.g. Powert, loc ett., and in other studies on Würtemberg Church-History is the 16th century, called forth by Jameson's work.

² The passages are given in greater detail in "Ernmering much dom Lauf der Passeten gestellt." Tobingen, 1568, and "Dresselin Produgten vom Türken," Tübingen, 1569, in Döllinger, "Die Reformation," 3, pp. 376–378, — Bossert, rhid., p. 357.

Protestantism, yet the increase of immorality which has been proved to have endured for a long course of years, brings the historian face to face with a question not lightly to be dismissed: Why did the preaching of the new Evangel, with its supposedly higher standard of religion and morality, especially at the springtide of its existence and in its full vigour, not bring about an improvement, but rather the reverse ?

This question applies, however, equally to other countries which were then torn from the Church, and to the persons principally instrumental in the work.

In Hesse the religious upheaval, as even Protestant contemporaries conceded, also promoted a great decline of morals.

The bad example given by Landgrave Philip tended to increase the evil.1 A harmful influence was exercised not only by the Landgrave's Court but also by certain preachers, such as Johann Lening,2 who enjoyed Philip's favour. Elisabeth, Duchess of Rochlitz, the Landgrave's sister, and a zealous patron of the Evangel, like the Prince himself, cherished rather lax views on morality. At first she was indignant at the bigamy, though not on purely moral grounds. The sovereign met her anger with a threat of telling the world what she herself had done during her widowhood. The result was that the Duchess said no more.* The Landgrave's Court-preacher, Dionysius Melander, who performed the marriage ceremony with the second wife, had, five years before, laid down his office as preacher and leader of the innovations at Frankfort on the Maine, " having fallen out with his fellows and personally compromised himself by carrying on with his housekeeper." He was a "violent, despotie and, at times, course and obseene, popular orator whose personal record was not unblemished."4

A Hesman church ordinance of 1539 complains of the moral retrogression: Satan has estranged men from the communion of Christ "not only by means of factions and sects, but also by carnal wantenness and dissolute living." The old Hessian

¹ Cp. above, parsim. * See above, p. 65.

^{*} Cp. above, parsim.

* See above, p. 65.

* Briefwechiel Philipps von Hessen,

* 1, p. 194 f

* Köstan-Kawerau, 2, p. 315 f. On his marriage, see above, p. 157.

* A. L. Richter, * Die evangel. Kirchenordnungen des 16 Jahrhunderta," 1, p. 290.

historian Wigand Lause writes, in his "Life and deeds of Philip the Magnanimous, Landgrave of Hesse," that, the people have become very awage and uncouth, "as though God had given us. His precious Word, and thereby delivered us from the immunetable abominations of Popery and its palpable idelatry, simply that each one might be free to do or leave undone whatever he pleased "; "many evil deeds were beginning to be looked upon by many as no longer similar or vicious." He accuses "the immunitaries, ministers and governors of corrupting the people by themselves transgressing the "good, Christian regulations" which had been act up, and charges both preachers and heavers with serving Mammon, and with "barefood extertion," not to mention other sins and vicos."

The Reman theologisms and preachers transferred the remonsibility for the abolition of "law and order," for the increme of the "fraction of the fieth within the Evangel" and for the fading away into a "state like that of Bodom and Comorcha" to the enculders of the "mag strates and officials." The latter, on the other hand, boldly asserted that the preachers themselves were the cause of the evil, since they led a "wicked, scandalous life, drinking, gambling, practising usury and no forth, and were, some of them, guilty of still worse things, brawling, fighting and wrangling with the people in the taverns and behaving improperty with the women." Bucer himself, Philip a adviser in ecclesimetical matters, wrote sayly to the Landgrave, in 1639 from Marking: "The people are becoming demonstrated and immorability is gaining the upper bond." "Where are b contempt prevails for God and the authorities there the devil is omnipotent."

2. At the Contro of the New Paith

If we glance at the Saxon Electorate we shall find the deep despondency frequently displayed by Luther concerning the deplonable mond decadence prevailing there only too well justified.

The downward trend appeared to have set in in earnest and all hope of remedying affairs seemed lost.4

The Court and those in authority not only did little to check the cyclibit, by their example, even tended to promote many disorders. The Elector, Johann Frederick "the Magnanimous" (1682–1547), was addicted to drink. The barquets which be ¹ "Loben," etc. (" Zeitschr, des Vereins für hess, Gesch,," Suppl. 2, 191. I mat 2011, p. 379 ff.

* Nessterker, * Unkonden was der Reformationszuit * p. 984 ff Janssen, * Hist. of the Cerman People * Eng Trans 1, 8, pp. 88-91, Massericomp, "Hess. KG, mi Zeitalter der Reformation," 2, p. 613 f. Janssen, ibid.

* " Briefwechsel "hilipps," 1, p. 121 f. Janssen, rbal.

Cp. above, passen, and vol. al., p. 324., vol. 12, pp. 723 ff., 216 ff.
 346, 345 f.

gave to his friends-in which wine was indulged in to an extent unusual even in those days when men were secustomed to heavy drinking—became a byword. Luther himself came to speak strongly on his excessive drinking. "His only faults," he laments in the Table-Talk, " are his drinking and routing too much with his companions 111 " He has all the virtues but just fancy him swilling like that I "a Yet Luther has an excuse ready: " He is a stout man and can stand a deep draught - what he must needs drink would make mother man dead drunk." " Unfortunately not only our Court here but the whole of Germany is plagued with this vice of drunkenness. It is a bad old eustom in the German lands which has gone on growing and will continue to grow. Henry, Duke of [Brunswick] Wolfenbüttel calls our Elector a drunkard and very Nabal with whom Abigail could not socak until he had slept off his carouse "4. We have the Elector's own comment on this in a letter to Chancellor Brück. " If the Brunswick fellow writes that we are a drunken Nabal and Benadad, we eannot entirely deny that we sometimes follow the German custom "; at any rate the Brunswicker was not the man to find fault, for he was an even harder drinker.

Johann Frederick was accused by Philip of Hesse of the ground immorality. This happened when the former refused to defend Philip's bigamy and when his Superintendent, Justia Memus, who was given to lauding the Elector's virtues, showed as inclination to protest publicly against the Landgrave's bigamy. This led Philip to write this warning to his theologian Bucer: "If those saintly folk, Justia Memus and his crew, amuse themselves by writing against us, they shall have their answer. And we shall not leave hidden under a bushel how this most august and quite ainless Elector, once, under our roof at Cassel, and again, at the time of the first Diet of Spirm, committed the crime of sodomy."

A. Hausrath remarks concerning this in his "Lathers Leben ": That Philip was lying "can hardly be taken for granted",? G.

^{*} Ibid., p. 373.

* Hausrath, 2, p. 391.

* Letter of Feb 0, 1541. See G. Mentz, "Johann Friedrich der Grommutige," 3, Jena, 1868 p. 344, according to certain "archives." — Steinbausen ("Kulturgesch, der Deutschen," p. 508), calle the Elector Johann Frederick quite simply a "drunkard". He points out that Anna of Saxony died of drink and that the Saxona, even in the 15th century, were noted for their drinking habits.

century, were noted for their drinking habits.

* Letter of Jan. 3, 154). "Briofweelest Hulippe," ed. Lenz, I, p. 302.

* "Lathers Leben," 2, Berlin, 1904, p. 391.

Monts, likewise, in his recent work, " Joh. Friedrich der Grossmutage," mays: "It is difficult simply to ignore the Landgrave's statement, but we do not know whether the allusion may not be to some an committed in youth." Here belongs also the passage in Philip of Hesso's letter to Lather of July 27, 1540 (above, p. 60; where he calls the Elector to bear witness that he the Landgrave) had done "the worst." The Bibical expression " peccatum presument" atond for reclamy. Further charges of a minular noture were even more explainly laid at the door of Johann Frederick. A Cathoric, relating the proceedings in Brimswick at the close of the conquest of that country by the Protestant troops in 1542, speaks of "view and outrages against nature then indulged in by the Elector at the Castle as is common y reported and concerning which there is much talk among the Court people "1 Duce Henry of Branswick in a tract of 1544 referred not only to the kiletory canction of the Landgrave's bigainy, in return for which he was spaced by the latter, but also to the "many other prinks which might be encountantially proved against them and which deserved more severe punishment "than that of the sword." The "more severe pun shment " means burning at the stake, which was the penalty decreed by the laws of the Empire for sodomy, whereas polygamy and adultery were simply jumshed by decapitation. Both sovereigns in their reply flatly denied the charge, but, evidently, they clearly understood its nature, they had never been guilty, they said, of "sharaefal, dishanourable pranks deserving of death by fire." *

Whatever the truth may be concerning this particular charge which involves them both, both Landgrave and Elector certainly left behind them so bad a record that Adolf Hausrath could say. The pair (but the Landgrave even more than the Elector) did their best "to make mockery of the claim of the Evangelicals that their Evangel would revive the morabity of the German nation." He instances in particular the bigamy, "which put any belief in the reality of their piety to a severe test and prepared the way for a great moral defeat of Luther's cause."

In the matter of the biganiy attempts were made to exculpate the Elector Johann Frederick by alleging, that

J Teil Jenn, 1909, p. 343 f.

Janssen, "Hist. of the German People" (Eng. Trons.), 6, p. 213.
 Hortleder, "Von den Ursachen des Teutschen iszuge Karla V. auf richt sein absoldastis," 1, Gotha, 1645, p. 1837.

Port, p. 1869 f.

⁴ N. Parisa, who examined the matter more closely in the ⁹ Hast, Label — 39, 1900, p. 154, comes to the conclusion that Monta in his Lafe of Johann Frederick has not laid sufficient weight or the testimony of the water see.

 [&]quot;Luthers Leben," 2, p. 391 f.

he regarded the Landgrave's step not as a real new marriage but as mere concubinage. The fact is, however, he was sufficiently well informed by Bucer in Dec. 1539, i.e. from the very beginning, learnt further details two months later from the Landgrave's own lips, and declared himself "satisfied with everything." When, later, the Elector began to take an unfavourable view of the business, Philip wrote to Bucer (July 24, 1540), pointing out that he had nevertheless sent his representative to the wedding. It is, however, true that the Elector had all along been against any making public of so compromising an affair and had backed up his theologians when they urged the Landgrave to deny it.²

There is no more ground for crediting Johann Frederick with "strictness of morals" than for saying that the Elector Frederick the Wise (1486–1525), under whose reign Lutheranism took root in the land, was upright and truthful in his dealings with the Pope and the Empire.

The diplomatic artifices by which the latter protected Luther whilst pretending not to do so, the dissembling and double-dealing of his policy throws a slur on the memory of one who was a powerful patron of Lutheranism. Even in Kostlin-Kaweran⁴ we find his behaviour characterised as "one long subterfuge, seeing, that, whilst giving Luther a free hand, he persisted in making out that Luther's cause was not his "; his declaration, that "it did not become him as a layman to decide in such a controversy," is rightly branded as misleading.

The Protestant Pictists were loudest in their complaints. In his "Kirchenhistoric," Gottfried Arnold, who was one of them, blamed, in 1699, this Elector for the "curning and the political intrigues" of which he was suspected; he is angry that this so undevout promoter of Lutheranism should have written to Duke George, his cousin, "that he never undertook nor ever would undertake to defend Luther's sermons or his controversal writings," and that he should have sent to his minister at Rome the following instructions, simply to pacify the Pope: "It did not become him as a secular Prince to judge of these matters, and he left Lather to answer for everything at his own risk." The same historian also points out with dissatisfaction that the Elector Frederick, "though always unmarried, had, by a certain female, two sons called Frederick and Schastian. How he explained this to his spiritual directors is nowhere recorded." The "female" in question was Anna Weller, by whom he had, besides these two sons, also a daughter.

Cp. above, passim.
 Vol. L, p. 601.

Against his brother and successor, Johann, surnamed the Constant (1525-1582), Lutber's friends brought forward no such complaints, but merely reproached him with letting things take their course. Amold instances a statement of Melanchthon's according to which this good Lutheran Prince "had been very negligent in examining this thing and that," so that grave disorders now called for a remedy. Luther, too, whilst praising the Elector's good qualities, declares, that "he was far too indulgent." "I interfere with no one," was his favourite saying, "but merely trust more in God's Word than in man." The protestaof the Emperor and the representations of the Catholics. politics and threats of war left him quite namoved, whence his title of "the Constant"; "he was just the right man for Luther," says Hausmith, "" for the latter did not like to see the gentlemen of the Saxon Chancery, Brück, Beyer, Planitz and the rest, interfering and urging considerations of European politics. 'Our dear old father, the Elector,' Luther said of him in 1580, "has broad shoulders, and mustnow bear everything."

The favour of these Princes caused Luther frequently to overstep the bounds of courtesy in his behaviour towards them. Julius Boehmer, who is sorry for this, in the Introduction to his selection of Luther's works remarks, that he was gusty of "want of respect, nay, of rudeness, towards the Elector Frederick and his successor Johann." Of Luther's relations with Johann Frederick, Hausrath says: "It is by no means certain that the Duke's [Henry of Brunswick's] opinion [viz. that Luther used to speak of his own Elector as Hans Wurst (i.e. Jack Pudding)] was without foundation; in any case, it was not far from the mark. With his eternal plans and his narrow-minded obstinacy, ^{*} Frankfurt, 1899, 2, p. 44. * 1bid. * 'Allg deutsche Biographie,'' 7, p. 781 (Flathe).

Hausrath, loc, cst., 2, p. 67.
 Martin Luthers Werke für das deutsche Volk, 1997, p. xiii

Luther's corpulent master was a thorn in the side of the aged Reformer. . . . 'He works like a donkey,' Luther once and of him, and, unfortunately, this was perfectly true."1

In his will dated 1587, Luther addressed the following words of consolation to the princely patrons and promoters of his work, the Landgrave and the Elector Johann Frederick: It was true they were not quite stainless, but the Papists were even worse; they had indeed trespassed on the rights and possessions of others, but this was of no great consequence: they must continue to work for the Evangel, though in what way he would not presume to dictate to them. 4-Melanchthon, who was so often distressed at the way the Princes behaved on the pretext of defending the Evangel, complains that " the sophistry and wickedness of our Princes are bringing the Empire to run," in which "bitter cry," writes a Protestant historian, "he sums up the result of his own unhappy experiences."

From the accounts of the Visitations in the Electorate we learn more details of the condition of morality, law and order in this the focus of the new Evangel. The proximity and influence of Luther and of his best and most faithful preachers did not constitute any bulwark against the growing corruption of morals, which clear-sighted men indeed attributed mainly to the new doctrines on good works, on faith alone and on Evangelical freedom.

In the protocols of the first Vantation (1527-1529) we read : The greater number of these entrasted with a cure of souls, are "in an evil case": reckless marriages are frequent amongst the Haureth, ibid., 1, p. 390.

 Bnelwecheel," 11 p. 209, from the original at Weimar, written. by Bugunhagen: "Licunque stuf un quibusdam percoleres si non un ananibus pare, columisantibus hoc etiam sel forte accusantibus adversarius, tunes confident de Domini benitate," etc. And before the, concorning the "adversariories clamores" Reposed bens ecclematers, " " etc., they were to comfort themselves, " qu'is son esc reposed, quemadredum quidam alss / midea ensis ina per hare brine circure quie sunt religiorna. So paid prateres speed ex talibus bones accedit, quis pursus es macepret? Propopum sunt talia, non nebulanum papularum, 1. The general application of church property districted his mind, as we can see, but he eversomes his secuples, and persuades himself that their action, like his own, was really directed against Antichrist : " Inhe mess corbie, at famont un Deo confidenter pra causa esangelis quicquid Spiritus sanctus suggesserit , non preservici est modium. Misericota l'iris confertet ese, ut manrant in lite eans doctrine et gratiae agant, quod eunt liberati ab Amischrasio.

Ellinger, "Melanchthon," p. 588.

prochem; complaints were lodged with the Electoral Vactors concerning the preacher at Locks who had three vives living. 1 At a later Yuntation a preacher was discovered to have had six children by two autors. Many of the preachers had waves whom they had atolen from hasbands still living. The account of the people whether in town or country was not much more reassuring , many localition had carned themselves a bad repute for biasphony and general adultery. In many places the people were declared to be so wiched that only "the hangman and the pailer would be of any evail." Bession this, the pamenages were in a wretched state. "The foundations had fallen in, or in many instances, had been scued by the notice, the lands and meadows belonging to the para nages had been a ld by the parab-councils, and the money from the sale of shallows and monetraness spent on drank. The educational system was so completely rushed that in the Wittenberg destrict, for materice, in which there were 148. town and country livings with hundreds of chapels of east, vidy Il schools remained.

As early as 1527 Melanchthen had viewed with profound disting the "serious runs and decay that increase everything good," which, he says, was riearly preserved at Wittenberg, "his writes, "how greatly men hate one another, how great is the contempt for all uprightness, how great the ignorance of those who stand at the head of the riturebes, and above all how forgetful the rulers are of God". And again, in 1528; "No one hates the Evanget more bitterly than these who like to be considered ours." "We see," he amends in the same year, "how greatly the people hate us."

His friend Justin Jones, who was acquainted with the enndations in the flauor kiectorate from long personal expension, wrote in 1830. "These who call themselves Evangelical are becoming utterly deprayed, and not only is there no longer any fear of tend among them but there is no respect for outward appearances or her; they are weary of and disjusted with sermons, they dequies their pastors and preactives and treat them has the diet and dust of the streets." "And bendes all this, the common propie are becoming utterly sharecasts, incident and rufficulty, as if the Evangel had only been sent to give loved follows liberty and more for the practice of all their vices."

The next boststem, held erven years later, only confirmed the growth of the ev l. In the Wittenberg detect in particular companies were raised concerning " the increase in godien-

³ On test in January, "Hot, of the Comman People" (Eng. Trunc), 5, p. 100 f.

[&]quot;The express, Michael Kramer, first took a wife at Canata, and when also began to lead a bad life, married a second at Dominitasch "on the strength of an advice secured." On account of matrimental squabbles he married a third time, after obtaining advice from Luther through the magnifector. C. A. Burkhardt, "Briefwoheel Lathers," p. 10°, c. 100° Gesch. d. sachs. Kiccoon- and Schulvistationen," p. 48.

1. 100° of 1° 1, pp. 888, 913, 982. Döllinger, "Referention," l., pp. 384.

hving the prevaling contempt and biasphensy of the Ward of God, the complete neglect of the Supper and the general flappent and resverent behaviour during Divine corvice."1

Of a later period, when the fracts of the change of religion had otili further repond, Melanchthon's friend Cameranus says: " Manhard have note attached the goal of their dearen-boundloss bhorty to think and art exactly as they please. Reason, moderation, law, recruitly and duty have lost all value, there is no reverence for contemporaries and no respect for pustority. 18

The Kierter Augustus of Saxony gow more into particulars when he writes: "A degraceful custom has become established in our villages. The pressure at the high fest cals, such as Christmas and Whitesinude, begin their drinking bouts on the eve of the lestival and projong them throughout the night, and the most day they either sleep through the morning or ear come drunk to church and enore and gruns like puge during the whole nerview." He represent the routers of making use of the charden as were collars, the contempt displayed for the preachess, the eroffing at served rates and the "frequent blamburny and curving " " Martlet and about solds luncavir-arress " were the consequences of each contempt for religion. Hut any improvement was not to be looked for swing that there were hard y any echicle remaining, and the cure of souls was left principally in the charge of ministers such as the Elector proceeds to describe The nobles and the other foudal lords, he save, " appropriately-There to the appairty ignorant, destitute artisains, or else ing out their arrives, outsiders or groups as pricets and set them in the havings as no to have shear all the more under their thumb." I

The state of things in Sakony provided the Landgrave with a serviceship weapon against Lather when the latter showed an incination to repud-ate the lightny, or to my he had merely "acted the fool" is concluding it. The passage has been quoted above (p. 54), where the Landgrave exharted fam to pay how attention to the world a openion, but rather to set himard and all the greathers in the Sanon Electronic to the task of checking the "view of adulacy, many and drunkensors which trees no longer regarded as uras, and that, not merely by writings and services, but by earnest admonstron and by racess of the bon.

it is true that the conditions which accompanied the introduction of his new evision were a trial to Easther, which he sought to remedy. The Landgrave could not represent him with actual miliflurance. Not murely by "writings and services," but also by "enryont adaptation" and even by re-introducing the "term of the Church " he strove to check the meng tide of moral evil. But the eval was the stronger of the two, and the causes, for which he broadf was emponsible, lay too deep. We have an exercise of the way in which he frequently sought to earls the muchief, in his quarrel with Harm Metasch, the deprayed Commandant of

From Burkhardt, ibid. Jamesen, ibid.

Janosen, shell, 6, p. 521, given as Melanchthon's words.
 A. L. Hieriter "The engage! Microscopic ungent des 16. Johrh." 2. pp. 101-1024. January stud. p. 523. W. Schmidt (* Kareben und Refusives that come are marked. Kurkerest with 18.5" 1807. Hft. 1.8. " Sobretton den Version für Rif. " No. 90) fasseien be onn dietern a derinan araproversest in occimination, blo and in the Achoel system about the year 1555.

Wattenberg, whose he excluded from the Supper 5

He same up his greevances against the state of things in the Electorate and at Wattenberg in a letter to Johann Mariel, in which he cade Wittenberg a new Sudom. He writes to this prescher (Nov. 10, 1539 : "Together with Lot (2 Peter st. 8), you and other mous Christians, I, too, am terminated, paguing and martyred in this awful Sudom by shameful ingratitude and horrible contempt of the Divine Word of our heloved deviour, when I are how Batan serve upon and taken presented of the bearts of those who think themselves the first and most important in the kingdom of Christ and of God., beyond this I am tempted and plagued with interior anisety and distress.' Its theo goson to come in his friend, who was also troubsed with mesancholy and the lear of death, by a sympathetic reference to the death of Christ. He then admits again of himself that he was "dis-tressed and greatly plagued " and " compassed by more than one kind of death in this miserable, himentable age, where there is nothing but ingretitude, and where every kind of wirkwhiem gains the upper hand. . . . Wait for the Lord with patience, for He is now at hand and will not delay to come. Amen. '4

2. Lather's Attempts to Explain the Deckins in Merals.

Lather quite candelly admitted the distressing state of things described above without in the least glossing it over, which indeed he could not well have done; in fact, he own statements give us an even clearer insight into the searny eide of hie in his day. He meaks of the growing decreters with pain and version : the more so made he could not but see that they were bring formented by his doctrane of partification by faith alone.

"This preaching," he may, "exacts by rights to be accepted and listered to with great juy, and everyone ought to improve humelf thereby and become more picus. But, unfortunately, the revenue is now the case and the longer it endures the worse the world becomes, that is (the work of) the devil himself, for now we are the people becoming range infamous, range avarations, more unmerciful, more unchaste and in every way worse than they were under Popery. 114

The Evargelicate new are not merely worse, but " seven terms worse than before " so he complains as early as 1529. " For after having heard the Evangel we still continue to steal, lie, cheat, feed and swill and to practise every view. Now that one david

^{*} For the way Metsuch was dealt with, see Lasterbach, "Tagebuch," pp. 163, 187. "Hnefe," 6, p. 213 f. Below, vol. v., xxx., 3, * "Briefe," 5, p. 223 f. * "Worke," Erl. ed., 17, p. 14, "Hampontille,"

[that of Popery] has been driven out seven others worse than it have entered into us, as may be seen from the way the Princes, lords, nobles, burghers and presents behave, who have lost all sense of fear, and regard not God and His menaces."1

From his writings a long, dreary list of sins might be compiled, of which each of the classes here mentioned had been guilty. In the last ten years of his life such lamentations give the tone to most of what he wrote.

"The nobles scrape money together, rob and plunder"; "like so many devile they grind the poor churches, the pastors and the preachers. ' The burghers and pessents do nothing but hoard, are usurers and cheats and behave defiantly and weatonly without any fear of punishment, so that it once to heaven for vengeance and the earth can endure it no longer." "On all hands and wherever we turn we see nothing in all clauses but a delage of dreatful ingratitude for the beloved Evangel."

"Nowadaya the Gospet is preached, and whoever chouses can hear it . . . but burghers, peasants and nobles all scorn their minusters and preachers."2

"I have often said that a plague must fall upon Germany; the Princes and gentry deserve that our Lord God should play them a trick; there will be such bloodshed that no one will know his own hence" 1 "Now that all this [the Evangel] is presched rightly and plainly, people cannot dropus it enough. In old days monasteries and churches were built with no regard. for cost, now people won't even repair a hole in the roof that the grammater may be dry; of their contempt I may nothing, it is enough to move one to lears to witness such scorn. Hence I say : Take care, you are young it may be you will live to see and experience the coming misfortune that will break over Germany. For a storm will burst over Germany, and that without fail. . . . I do not mind so much the pessents' averses and the foresention. and unmorality now on the increase everywhere, as the contempt for the Evangel. . . . That peasants, burghers and nobles thus contenue the Word of God, will be their undoing,"*

To the question whence the moral decline amongst the adherents of the new teaching came, Luther was wont to give various answers. Their difference and his occasional selfcontradictions show how his consciousness of the disorders and the complaints they drew from every aide drive himinto a corner.

^{* &}quot;Werke," Werm, ed., 28, p. 763; Erl. ed., 36, p. 411, coremsion of the "Auslegung über ethiche Kapitel des finften Bietes Mosse," 1523, * Ibid., Erl. ed., 91, p. 330 f., "Kurchenpostille." * Ibid., 42, p. 4, "Hauspostille."

[·] Ind. 1 loid., p. 6.

The most correct explanation was, of course, that the mischief was due to the nature of his teaching on faith and good works; to this, involuntarily, he comes back often enough.

"That we are now so lazy and cold in the performance of good works," he says, in a recently published sermon of 1525, " is due to our no longer regarding them as a means of partification. For when we still hoped to be justified by our works our sequifor doing good was a maryel. One sought to excel the other in uprightness and porty. Were the old teaching to be revived to-day and our works made contributory to righteousness, we should be reading and more willing to do what is good. Of this there is, however, no prospect and thus, when is a a question of serving our neighbour and praying God by means of good works, we are sluggish and not disposed to do anything 1. " The ourse we are of the righteogeness which Christ has won for up, the colder and edler we are in teaching the Word, in prayer, in good works and in enduring misiortune." *

"We teach," he continues, "that we attain to God's grace wit sout any work on our part. Hence it comes that we are so lasthou in doing good. When there upon a take, we intered that God rewarded our works, I run to the awagetery, and you gave ten gulden towards building a clurch. Men then were glad to do something through their works and to be their own "Justus at Salvator ' (Lach, 18., 9)". Now, when asked to give, everylaidy protests he is pive and a brigger, and eave there is no obligation of giving of all performing good works. "We have become worst than formerly and are k-ing our old rightenumens. Moreover, avaries is increasing everywhere."

Though here Luther finds the reman of the neglect of good works no clearly in his own teaching, yet on other occasions, for instance, in a series n of 1532, he grows aligny when his ductions m made responsible for the mached,

Only "clamourers," no he says, could press such a charge, Yet, at the some time, he fully admits the declare : " I own, and others doubtless do the same, that there is not new such surnestnew to the times, as formerly under the monte and private when to many foundations were made, when there was so much building and no one was in most as not to be able to give. But new there as not a term willing to support a preacher, there is nothing but plandering and this virge among the people and no one can prevent it. Whence comes that shameful plague? The clamourees answer, 'from the teaching that we must not build upon or trust in works." But it is the devel himself who acts down with an effect to pure and while-unit doctrine, whereas it is t entraint in epond souther," 2, p. 351.

"Werke," Welm. ed., 27, p. 443.

 Worker Worse ed. 27 p. 443, according to another set of noise. of the aermon quoted in R. 1.

In reality due to his own and the people's malice who ill-one such doctrines, and to our old Adam. . . . We are, all answers, becoming lazy, careless and remas."

"The devil's makee!" This is another explanation to which Luther and others not unfrequently had recourse. The devil could do such extraordinary and apparently contradictory things! He could even teach men to "pray fervently." In the Table-Talk, for instance, when asked by his wife why it was, that, whereas in Popery "we prayed so diagently and frequently, we are now so cold and pray so seldom," Luther put it down to the devil. "The devil made us fervent," he says; "he ever urges on his servants, but the Holy Ghost teaches and exhorts us how to pray aright; yet we are so tepid and slothful in prayer that nothing comes of it." Thus it might well be the devil who was answerable for the misuse of the Evangel.

On another occasion, in order to counteract the bad impression made on his contemporaries by the fruits of his preaching, he says: "Our morals only look so bad on account of the sanctity of the Evangel; in Catholic times they stood very low and many vices prevailed, but all this was unperceived amidst the general darkness which shrouded doctrine and the moral standards which then held; now, on the other hand, our eyes have been opened by a purer faith and even small abuses are seen in their true colours." His words on this subject will be given below.

It even seemed to Luther that the decay of almsgiving and the paraimony displayed towards the churches and the preachers proved the truth of the Evangel ("argume est, verum esse crangelium nostrum"), for, so he teaches in a sermon preached at Witteaberg in 1527, "the devil is the Prince of this world and all its riches, as we learn from the story of Christ's Temptation. He is now defending his kingdom from the Evangel which has risen up against him. He does not now allow us so many possessions and gifts as he formerly did to those who served him (i.e. the Papists), for their Masses, Vigils, etc., hay, he robs us of everything and spends it on himself. Formerly we supported many hundred monks and now we cannot ruise the needful for one Evangelical preacher, a sign that our Evangel is the true one and that the Pope's empire was the devil's own, where he bestowed gifts on his followers with open hands and incited them to hixury, avaries, formication and gluttony. And their teaching was in conformity therewith, for they urged those works which pleased them."

^{1. &}quot; Werke," Erl. ed., 185, p. 353.

¹ Ibid 59, p. 6. Cp. Mathenes, "Tischreden," p. 85.

The observer may well marvel at such strange trains of thought. Luther's doctrine has become to him like a polestar around which the whole firmament must revolve. Experience and logic alike must perforce be moulded at his pleasure to suit the idea which donunates him.

It was impossible to suppress the inexorable question put by his opponents, and the faint-hearted doubts of many of his own followers: Since our Saviour taught. "By their fruits shall you know them," how can you be a Divinely sent teacher if these are the moral effects of your new Evangel? And yet Luther, to the very close of his career, in tones ever more confident, insists on his higher, may, Divine, calling, and on his election to "reveal" hidden doctrines of faith, strange to say, those very doctrines to which he, like others too, attributed the decline.

Concerning his Divine mission he had not hesitated to say in so many words: Unless God calls a man to do a work no one who does not wish to be a fool may venture to undertake it; "for a certain Divine call and not a mere whim " is essential to every good work." Hence he frequently sees in success the best test of a good work. In his own case, however, he could point only to one great result, and that a negative one, viz. the harm done to Popery: the Papacy had been no match for him and had failed to check the apostasy. The Papists' undertaking, such is his proof, is not a success; it goes sideways " after the fashion of the crab." "Even for those who had a sure Divine vocation it was difficult to undertake and carry through anything good, though God was with them and assisted them; what then could those silly fools, who wished to undertake it without being called, expect to do ? " "But I, Dr. Martin, was called and compelled to become a Thus I was obliged to accept the office of a Doctor. Hence, owing to my work, "this which you ace [&]quot;Werke," Weim ed., 24, p. 455.

Google

 * Ibid., 30, 3, p. 386., Erl. ed., 254, p. 86. "Auff das vermeint Edict," 1531 has befallen the Papacy, and worse things are yet in store for it." To those who still refused to acknowledge Luther's call to teach he addresses a sort of command ? St. Paul, 1 Cor. xiv., 80, commanded all, even superiors, to be silent and obey "when some other than the chief teacher receives a revelation." "The work that Luther undertakes." "the great work of the Reformation," he assures all, was given not to the other side, but to him alone. - It is no wonder that his gainsayers and the doubters on his own side refused to be convinced by such arguments and appeals to the work of destruction accomplished, but continued to harp on the words: "By their fruits you shall know them," which text they took Literally, vis. as referring to actual fruits of moral improvement.

The "great work of the Reformation," i.e. of real reform, to which Luther appeals unless he was prepared to regard it as consisting solely in the damage done to the Roman Church-surely demanded that, at least at Wittenberg and in Luther's immediate sphere, some definite fruits in the shape of real moral amelioration should be apparent. Yet it was precisely of Wittenberg and his own surroundings that Luther complained so loudly. The increase of every kind of disorder caused him to write to George of Anhalt : "We live in Sodom and Babylon, or rather must die there; the good men, our Lots and Daniels, whom we so urgently need now that things are daily becoming worse, are snatched from us by death."2 So bad were matters that Luther was at last driven to flee from Wittenberg. The sight of the immorality, the vexation and the complaints to which he was exposed became too much for him; perhaps Wittenberg would catch the "Beggars' dance, or Beelzebub's dance," he wrote: "at any rate get us gone from this Sodom."3

According to his letters, the Wittenberg authorities did not interiors even in the case of the gravest disorders, but allowed themselves to be "playthings of the devils"; they looked on whilst the students " were runed by bad women," and " though half the town is guilty of adultery, usury, theft and chesting, <sup>Werke," Weim, ed., p. 385 ff. = $6 f.

March 9, 1545, "Briefe," ed. De Wette, 5, p. 722, letter called forth by the death of George Heid Forchheim, to whom the Prince was</sup> much attached no one tees to put the law in lores. They all simply smale, wink at it and do the same themselves. The world is a troublesome thing," 1. "The horden-folk have grown bold," he waster to the Elector, "they puress the young follows into these very rooms and shumbers, freely offering them their love; and I bear that many parents are recalling their children horan because, they say, when they and their children to us to study we hang women about their meta. 's He is agreet at the thought that the " sown and the school " should have heard Ged a Word so eften and so long and yet, "instead of growing better, become worse as time give on.' He fears that at his end he may hear, "that things were never wome than now?" and sees Wittenberg threatmed with the curve of Chorums, Bethenda and Capharnaum "!

To Catherine Bora, end of July, 1545, "Briefe," 5, p. 753.

In point of fact he did preach a segmen to the Wittenbergert in which, like a prophet, he predicts the judgements of bear en.*

In another erroon he augn y acqueents them with his determinution: "What am I to do with you Wittenbergers ? I am not going to preach to you may longer of Christ a Kanadom, steing that you will not accept it. You are thieves, robbers and men of no mercy. I shall have to preach you the Sachsensongel. They refuse, he says, to give anything to clergy church or schools. * Are you still ignorant, you unthankful beasts (segrator bessor) of whom they do for you?" He concludes: They must make up their minds to provide the needful, "otherwise I shad abandon the pulps."

Later you will find my prophecy fulfilled " he excel on one occasion after having ferefold "ween", "then you will long for one of those exhortations of Martin Luther."4

Her Table-Talk bears, if possible, even atrenger witness than his letters and sermons to the conditions at Wittenberg, for there . . he freely lets h mostligo. Bome of the though he says of the town and neighbourhood, found in the authentic notes of donle pupils. such as Mathemas, Lauterback and Schlagenhaufes, are worth consideration.

We hear from Lauterbach net only that Hara Metzieh, the town Commandant whom Lather had "exceminanicated," contioned to preserve the good at Wittenberg " with antique motive " and to " boast of his wichedness, " but that in the same year. Luther had to constiant of other men of influence and standing in the town who injured the Krimgel by their engages. great in the godfessness of those of mak that one was not asharmed to boast of having begotten forty-three chi-dren in a single year. mouther maked whether he mught rick take 40 per cent interest per genum." In the same year faither was obliged to exclude from the Secrement apother autonome, highly placed univer a

¹ To Justin Joses, June 18, 1843, "Briefe," 4, p. 570.

* On Jan. 22, 1544, "Bnefe," 5, p. 915.

" Vermahnung," Feb. or Nov., 1542, 'Briefe, ' 6, p. 343 Werke," Weim, ed., 34, 2, p. 80 ft; Erl, ed., 185, p. 23 ff Thirt., 27, p. 406 f., in the newly published arrenous of 1528. Ibid., p. 418 f. " Lauterbuch, Tagebuch," p. 187.

Iteid., p. 153.

"The soil of Wittenberg is bad," he declared, meaking from and expansions. "even were good, houset people sown here the erop would be one of coams Saxons,"1-

"The Gospel at Wittenburg," he once said portically, if we may trust Mathemas, " to like tain that falls on water, i.e. it has no effect. The good eatch the aw and the wicked the Gospel. *

"I have often wondered," he said in 1832, according to Schagushaufen, "why Our Lord God west His Word to this unfaithful world of Witterhery . I helieve that He sent it to Jerusalem, Wittenberg and such like places that He might, at the Last Day, be able to reprove their ingratitude." And again, "My opinion is that God will punish arverely the ingratitude shows to his Word, for there as not a man of postson or a persons who does not stamp on the numetors, but the service of the Word must remain, even the Turk has his manuters, otherwas he could not maintain his rule."

Lather a Evengel had made "low and command " to retreat into the background as compared with the liberty of the children of God., the penalties he devised, e.g. his exclusion of persons from the recovering of the Barranesia, proved prefectual. The would willingly have made use of encommunication if only "there had been people who would let themselves be excernmunicalist ". " The Pope's time which hept the people in check, he pays, " has been aboushed, and it would be a difficult task to re-establish law and command."4

"No. I should not like to endure this life for another forty years, so he told his friends on June 11, 1439, "even were God to turn it into a l'incadest for mir. I would enther hire an executioner to chop off my head , the world is no bad that all are turning anto devia, as that they could wak one nothing better than a happy death-had, and then away! '* The dear, hely hyangel of Christ, that great and previous treasure, we account as mougaincant, as if it were a verse from Terence or Virgil.""

He loand such duction of his teaching even in his own household and family. This it was which caused him, in 1532, to presch a course of sermous to be family circle on Bundays. No break of a form yellemit of all here, could connece at any ill contempt. of the Word. To the question of Dr. Jones as to the wherefore of these private andresses, he recited . " I are and know that the Word of God as an much neglected in my house as in the Church 1.1

There was no more hope for the world, nothing remains 1 inspouled and incorrapt " although, " now, God a Word is revealed, " yet "it is despised, sparried, corrupted, received at and poter cuted," even by the adherents of his teaching."

Lather made Mathemas that recipient of some of his confidences,

- Lauterbach, "Trecbuch," 179.
 Mathemus, "Aufseichnungen," p. 402.
- Behingenheufen, "Aufnerelseutzigen," p. 130. * Zbid., p. 130
-  Colleg.," ed. Bindeed, 3, p. 185
- "Werne," Erl. ed., 57, p. 323 (Table Tulk).
 Collequi ed. Rebenstoek, 2, p. 19.
- Werke," Erl, ed., 57, p. 96 f. (Table-Tulk).

as the latter relates in his sermons; on account of the scandals among the preachers of the neighbourhood he was forced and tirged by his own people to appeal to the Elector to erect a jult "into which such wild and turbulent fells might be depped." "Notes causes great scandals amongst the patrons and however of the new dectrine," anys Mathesian. The common people have become rough and self-confident and have begun to regard the minimizers as worthloss. "Venty," he exclaims, " the soul of this pious old gentleman was sadly to mented day by day by the unrighteous deeds he was obliged to witness, like pious Lot in Sodom."

With a deep sigh, as we read in Lauterbach's Notes, Lather pointed to the calamities which were about to overtake the world; it was so pervises and accorrigible that discipline or administion would be of no avail. Already there was the greatest consternation throughout the world on account of the revelation of the Word. It is cracking and I hope it will soon burst," and the Last Day arrive for which we are waiting. For all views have now become habitual and people will not bear reproof. His only constort was the progress made by studies at Wittenberg, and is some other places now thrown open to the Evangel 1

But how were the future preachers now growing up there to improve matters? This he must well have asked bisself when declaring, "with sohe," as Lauterbach relates, that "preachers were treated in most godiers and ungrateful fashion." The churches will soon be left without preachers and ministers; we shall shortly experience this misfortune in the churches; there will be a dearth not only of learned men but even of men of the commonest sort. Oh, that our young men would study more diligently and devote themselves to theology."

In view of the above it cannot surprise us that Luther gradually became a victim to habitual discouragement and niclancholy, particularly towards the end of his life. Proofs of the depression from which he suffered during the latter years of his life will be brought forward in a later volume.

Such fits of depression were, however, in those days more than usually common everywhere.

4. A Malady of the Age. Doubte and Melancholy

One of the phenomena which accompanied the religious revulsion and which it is impossible to pass over, was, as contemporary writers relate, the sadness, discontent and depression, in a word "melancholy," so widespread under the new Evangel even amongst its zealous promoters.

1 Lauterbarn, "Tagebuch," p. 70, Khummer, # Ibid , p. 80.

⁵ "Historien," p. 136". Cp. Mathenius, "Tuchreden, " p. 126 and 15 of Introduction, p. 72; Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 13. See above, p. 216

Melanchthon, one of Luther's most intimate friends, furnished on many occasions of his life a sad spectacle of interior dejection. Of a weaker and more timid mental build than Luther, he appeared at times ready to succumb under the weight of faint-heartedness and scruples, doubts and self-reproaches. (Cp. vol. m., p. 868 ff.) We may recall how his anxieties, caused by the scandal subsequent on his sanctioning of Philip's bigamy, almost cost him his life. So many are the records he left behind of discouragement and despondency that his death must appear in the light of a welcome deliverance. Luther sought again and again to revive in him the waning consciousness of the Divine character of their work. It is just in these letters of Luther to Melanchthon that we find him most emphatic in his assertion that their common mission is from God. It was to Melanchthon, that, next to himself, Luther applied the words already quoted, spoken to comfort a dejected pupil: "There must be some in the Church as ready to slap Satan. as we three; but not all are able or willing to endure this."1

Spalatin, who has so frequently been referred to as Luther's go-between at the Electoral Court, and who afterwards became pastor of Altenburg, towards the end of his life fell into incumble despondency. Justus Jones, likewise, was for a considerable time a prey to melancholy.8 Hieronymus Weller, one of Euther's best friends, confessed to having suffered at times such violent doubts and fears as would have driven a heathen to commit suicide. The preachers George Mohr 5 and Nicholas Hausmann (a very intimate friend of Luther's') had to endure dreadful panga of soul: the same was the case with Johann Beltzuis, Pastor.

Above, vol. iii., p. 410.

O Wagner, "Georg Spalatin," Altenburg, 1830, p. 105 f. Cp. Luther's letter to Spalatin quoted in vol. ii., p. 197, n. l, where he tells hum: "Tristim occide to "; by his (Luther's) mouth Christ had raised up Meiarchthon from a similar state induced by the "spiritus and a second processing and a second present min. be was still mexperienced "in the bettle against air or conscience and the law"; now, however, he must look upon Luther as St. Peter who speaks to him as he did to the lame man. "In the name of Christ, arise and walk"; Christ did not wish him to be "crucified with corrow", this came from the dev.! - We do not learn that these words had any effect.

<sup>Cp. above, vol. 11, p. 416. * Döllinger, "Die Reformation," 2, p. 193.
* Fortgesetzte Sammlung," Leipzig, 1740, p. 519.
M. Hempel, "Libellus H. Wellen, Lipsia, 1581, p. 80.</sup>

at Allerstedt in Thuringia, and with Simon Museus, who died at Manafeld in 1576 as Superintendent and who composed two works against the devil of melancholy. Nicholas Scheeker, who died Superintendent at Leipzig, was responsible for the rearranged edition of Luther's Table-Talk; according to the title his hope was to produce a work which it might console all Christians to read, especially in these wretched last days. Elsewhere he confirms the need of such consolation when he says: "We experience in our own selves" that sadness is of frequent occurrence.

Wolfgang Capito, the Strasburg preacher, wrote in 1586 to Luther that his experience of the want of agreement in doctrine had caused him such distress of mind that he was on the verge of the "malady of melancholia"; he trusted he would succeed in reaching a better frame of mind; the burden of gloom, so he comforts himself, was, after all, not without its purpose in God's plan in the case of many under the Evangel. With Capito, too, melancholy was a "frequent guest." Bucer wrote in 1582 to A. Blaurer that Capito had often bemoaned "his rejection by God."

Josehim Cameracius, the celebrated Humanist and writer, confessed in a letter to Luther, that he was oppressed and reduced to despair by the night of the decline in morals " in people of every age and sex, in every condition and grade of life "; everything, in both public and private life, ³ H. Weller, Preface to Beltzian, "On Man a Conversion," Leiptig, 1878.

* He wrote "Agrical the greenum plague of Melancholy," Erfort, 1957, and "A metal instruction against the demon of inclancholy," 1959 (a.t.). In the latter work he says in the Preface that he considered himself all the more called to comfort "sad and sorrowful hearts." because he himself "not seldom by sick in that same hospital."

We experience in our own selves, that our hearts become increasingly stupid, weak and timed, and often know not wheate it comes or what it is." "Der galize Psalter," Bd. 2, Nürnberg, 1566, p. 94.—On his edition of the Table-Talk, cp. "Luthers Werke," Eri.

ed., 67, p. xvi.

"Up. Kolite, "Analecta," p. 231, where Capito's letter to Lather of Juno 13, 1636, is given. The letter is also in Luther a "Briefwechiel," 10, p. 3-3. Capito there laments, "me describerem apid me factum, adea at an morbium metanchoheum prope inciderim. Historitatem, is poirre, recordia". The internal descensions, which pained and distensed him to the last degree, were the in include cause of his sadress, so be decisions.

* C. Gerbert, "Gesch, der Strassburger Sektenbewegung zur Zeit der Reformation, Strassburg, 1889, p. 183 f.

was so corrupt that he felt all picty and virtue was done for. Of the Schools in particular he woefully exclaimed that it would perhaps be better to have none than to have " such haunts of godlessness and vice." At the same time, however, he makes admissions concerning faults of his own which may have served to increase his dejection: He himself, inhis young days, had, like others, disgraced himself by a very victous life (" turpissime is adolescentia deformation "),1

The Naremberg preacher, George Besler, fell into a state of melancholia, declared "in his ravings that things were not going right in the Church," began to see hidden enemies everywhere and finally committed suicide with a "hogapear " in 1566. William Bidembach, preacher at Stuttgart, and his brother Balthasar, Abbot of Bebenhausen, both became a prey to melancholia towards the end of their life.

It would, of course, be foolish to think that many good nouls, in the simplicity of their heart, found no consolution in the new teaching and in working for its furtherance. Of the preachers, for instance, Beltsius, who has just been mentioned, declares, that, amidst his sadness Luther's consolations had "saved him from the abyse of hell."4 Amongst those who adhered in good faith to the innovations there were some who highly lauded the solace of the Evangel. But, notwithstanding all that may be alleged to the contrary, we cannot get over such testimonies as the following.

Felix, son of the above-mentioned William Bidembach, and Court preacher in Würtemberg, declared in a "Handbook for young church ministers". " It happens more and more frequently that many pious people fall into distressing sadness and real melancholia, to such an extent that they constantly experience in their hearts fear, apprehension, dread and despair "; in the course of his ministry he had met with both persons of position and common folk who were oppressed with such melancholia. Nicholas Scinecker (above, p. 220) assures us that not only were theologians

<sup>Kolde, "Analecta," p. 462 seq.
Contemporary account in J. C. Biebenkem, "Materialism sur Numberg, Gesch.," 2, Nuremberg, 1762, p. 754.
Fuschim, "Memoria theologorum Wartembergrasium," 1, Ulmu, $720, pp. 144, 171.
Cp. Bettaius, "Vom Jammer und Elend membehlichen Lebens und Westens," Leipzig, 1574-B1-3' "Haadbuch," etc., Frankfurt a, M., 1613, p. 725 f. (1 ed., 1603).</sup> perplexed with many "melancholy and anxious souls and consciences whom nothing could console," but physicians, too, "never remembered such prevalence of evil melancholia, depression and sadness, even in the young, and of other maladies arising therefrom, as during these few years, and such misfortune continues still to grow and increase. V

The Leipzig Pastor, Erasmus Sarcerius, speaks in a similar strain of the "general faint-heartedness prevalent in every class," who are acquainted with nothing but "feat and apprehension "it Victorinus Strigel, Professor at the University of Leipzig, of the "many persons who in our day have died simply and solely of grief"; * Michael Suchse, preacher at Wechmar, of people generally as being "It mid and anxious, trembling and despairing from fear."

When the preacher Leonard Bever related to Luther how in his great "temptations" the devit had tried to induce him to stab himself. Luther consoled him by teiling him that the same had happened in his own case.

We are told that in latter life Luther's pupil Mathesius was a prey to a "hellish fear" which lasted almost three months: "he could not even look at a knife because the sight tempted him to suicide." Later, his condition improved. The same Mathesius relates how Pastor Musa. found consolation in his gloomy doubts on faith in Luther's account of his own similar storms of doubt."

In the 16th century we hear many lamentations in Protestant circles concerning the unheard-of increase in the number of suicides.

"There is such an outery amongst the people," wrote the Laustz Superintendent, Zacharias Rivandor, "that it deafens one a care and makes one a hair stand on end. The people are so heavy-hearted and yet know not why. Amidst such lowness of spirit many are unable to find consolation, and, so, cut their throats and slay ther selves. "-In 1554 the Nuremberg Councillor, Hieronymus Baumgartner, Ismented at a meeting attended by the clergy of toe town: "We hear, also, how daily

Der ganze Pealter," Bd. 2, Naremberg, 1585, p. 94

Sarcerius, "Ethelia Fredigies," etc., Leipzig, 1561, Bl. C 2'
Singel, "Ypomnemata .," Lipzig, 1565, p. 219
Sactise, "Acht Tustpredigies," Leipzig, 1662, Bl. A 5'.
Machisma, "Autzentin ," p. 2-3 f. On the Disputation held at Leipzig is Beyer, the ex Augustiman, see vol. 1, p. 316.

C. Leesche, 'Joh Mathesius," 1, Goths, 1895, p. 223.
Mathesius, 'Historien," p. 147
Fest-Chroniks," 2 Th, Leiping, 1602, Bl. 2' (1 ed., 1891).

and more than ever before, people, whether in good health or not, fall into mortal fear and despuir, loss their minds and kill themselves." In 1869, within three weeks, fourteen aucides occurred at Nursemberg, 5. "You will readily recal," Lucas Onander and in a sermon about the end of the rentury, "how in the years gone by many otherwise good procise became so timorous, fainthearted and full of despair that they could not be comoied , and how of them not a few put an end to their own lives, this is a aign of the Last Day." 5

Lather harmelf confirms the increase in the number of suicides which took place owing to troubles of conscience.

In a normon of 1632 he bernoam, that " so many people are so disquieted and distressed that they give may to despite", this was chiefly induced by the "spirits," for there "have been, and still are, many who are driven by the devil and plagued with temptations and desput tal they hang themselves, or destroy themselves in some other way out of very fear 14. He is quite renvinced that the devil "driver" all sucides and nation them helpless tooks of his plans against human life. It was to this idea that the Lutherna preacher Hanselmann clung when he wrote, in 1866, that many trusted "that those who had been overtaken and destroyed by the devil would not be lost gretnerably ".

Andreas Celichius, Superintendent in the Mark of Brandonburg, was of opinion that such succides, such "very sudden and heartrending murders," " gave a had name to the Evanger in the world"; one sees and hears "that some is our very midst are quite unable to find comfort in the Evangelical emptuary. . . . This makes men distructful of the preaching of Jesus Christ and even sauce it to be hated."*

Michael Heiding, Bashop-auxidary of Mayence, found a special reason for the increase in the number of sucides amongst those who had broken with the Church, in their rejection of the Catholic means of grace. In a sermon which he delivered towards the end of 1547 at the Diet of Augsburg he cointed out that, ever mice the use of the Sacraments had been scorned, people were more exposed to the strength of the evil one and to discoaragement. "When has the devil ever driven so many to desperation, so that they lose all hope and kill themselves? Whose fault is it ! Ah, we deprive ourselves of God's grace and refuse to accept the Davine strength which is offered us in the Holy Secrements."*

O. Th. Strobel, "Neue Beytrage pur Lateratur," I, Nurerplang.

1790, p. 97,

* Honderf Sturm, * Casendarium Sanctomin * Leipzig 1599 p. 338, L. Deurder, "Bauren-Post fla," 4 Tl., Tubingen, 1599, p. 188.

 "Werke," Erl. ed., 18³, p. 365.
 Hocker-Hamelmana, "Der Teufel selba," 3 Tl., Umel, 1548 p. 170. Cohetaus in a work on much of "Natableher and nethwestiger Berseht von den Leuten, so sich neihet aus Anget, Verawertelung oder anders Ursaches entiribes und hisrichten," Magdeburg, 1578, BL A 2.85.R.5

7 Helding, "Von der halligeten Meue "Ingelitadt, 1548, p. 7

Among the Lutheran preachers the expected end of the world was made to play a part and to explain the increase of faint-heartedness and despair.

Matheum says in his Postils: "Many pine away and lose hope; there is no more joy or courage left among the people; therefore let us look for the end of the world and prepare, and be ready at any moment for our departure home!" "For the end is approaching; heaven and earth and all government new bogin to crack and break."

Luther's example proved catching, and the end of the world became a favourite tome both in the pulpit and in books, one on which the preachers' own gloom could aptly find vent. The end of all was thought to be imminent. Such forebodings are voiced, for instance, in the following: "No consolation is of any help to consciences"; " "many pine away in dejection and die of grief "; " in these latter days the wicked one by his tyranny drives men into fear and fright "; 4 " many despair for very dejection and sadness"; " "many pious hearts wax cowardly, seeing their sins and the wickedness of the world " ; 4 " the people hang their heads as though they were walking corpses and live in a constant dread ";" " all joy is dead and all consolation from God's Word has become as weak as water ": ! the number of those " possessed of the devil body and soul " is growing beyond all measure.*

³ Postilla oder Auslegung der Sonntagsevangellen," Nuremberg, 1565, p. 14.

* Seinecker, "Trostliche schone Spruch für die engstigen Gewissen," Leipzig, 1561, Preface.

* Georg Major (a Wittenberg Professor), "Homiton in Evangelia dominatedia," 1, Wittenberge, 1 so2, p. 38. Johann Pomarius, preacher at Magdeburg: People are growing so distressed and without they droop and languish," etc., the Last Day is, however, "at the door," "Postula," Bd. 1, Magdeburg, 1587, p. 6 f.

* Nikol. Kramer, "Wartzgartlem der Scelen," Frankfurt a. M., 1573, Bl. V., 3', Still nore emplantically the prescher Signmund Suevas ("Trews Warning für der leidigen Verzweiffelung," Gorlitz, 1572, p. A 3). The devil raves and rages in these latter days like a mad dog and tries above ad to make people despair.

* Christoph Tremeus, prencher at Easieben, * Prognosticon," 1578.

(n.l.), Bl D d 3.

Joh. Beltzus, "Yom Jammer," etc., Bl. B 3'.

* Rupwicht Erythropilus, preacher at Hanover, "Werkglock," etc., Frankfort n. N., 1995, p. 181 f.

Valerius Herberger, preacher at Frauntädt, "Herzpostella," Bl. 1, Leiping, 1614, p. 16 ff.

* Andreas Cellehius, "Notwendigo Erinnering," etc., Wittenberg, 1595, Bl. A 3 ff. He enumerates with terror thirty possessed persons.

Though the special advantage claimed for the new Evangel lay in the sure comfort it afforded troubled conciences, many found themselves unable to arouse within them the necessary faith in the forgiveness of their sins. Luther's own experience, viz. that "faith won't come," was also that of many of the preachers in the case of their own uneasy and tortured parishioners; their complaints of the fruitlessness of their labours sound almost like an echo of some of Luther's own uttersness.

"There are many prome souls in our churches," says Simon Pauls, of Rostock, "who are much troubled because they cannot really believe what they say they do, viz. that God will be gramous to them and will justify and save them."

The widespread melancholy existing among the paralleonors quite as much and cometimes more so than among the pastors, explains the quantity of consolatory booklets which appeared on the market during the second half of the 10th century, many of which were expressly designed to check the progress of this morbid melancholy.³ Beinecker's work, mentioned above, is a specimen of this sort of hierature. The Hamburg prescher, 3 Magdeburgius, write. "Never has these been such need of encouragement as at this time." The Superintendent, Andrews Colichias, laments that people "are quite numble to find comfort in the sametimary of the Evangel, but, the the heather who knew not God, are becoming melancholy and desperate," and this too at a time when "God, by means of the evangels at preaching, is daily despensing abundantly all manner of right excellent and officacious consolation, by the shoveful and not morely by the spoonful. "6—It was, however, a vasily more difficult in Meckienburg alone, among whom, however he probably includes many who were simply med. "Here, in the immediate vicinity," he cays, "three preschere have lost their nunds, and would even appear to be bodily presented." I Mechani ("Geoch, der Wissenschaften in die Mark Brandenburg," Ber in, 1761, p. 500) rightly remarked: "The plentiful westings and nermons on the devil a power, . . . on the portests of the Last Judgment, such in comets, meteors, bloody run, etc., out many their reason during the latter half of the 18th century."

Cordatus "Tagebuch," p. 452. " Articulus files" won t go home, idea toj accident tristation.

* "Extract order America and der Postill "Magdeburg 1584, o. 1) f.

* See N. Paulus, "Die Melanchotze im 16 Jahrh." ("Wess. Berlage gur Germanna," 1897, No. 18), p. 137 ff.; on p. 140 he refers to G. Draudius, "Bibl. libr germ.," for the latter of many such works of consolation. For the above description we have made use of this net article by Paulus and of his other one. "Der Se battaord im 16 Jahrh." Sed., 1896, No. 1.

4 "Eyna arhone Artiney dadurch der leidenden Christen Sorga and Betrübnus gehndert werden," Lubeck, 1555, p. 145.

* Op. cst., Bl. A 3', R 5.

PY -0

matter to find comfort in the bare " Sole Fidee " than it had been for the accentors of these Evangelicals to find it in the Clusch o way. Thanks to their co-operation, it was given to them to experience the vivilying and mixing strength of the Secrements and of the Eucharatic Sacritics, to and example and encouragemost in the reneestion of the Sounta and in the cities, to be but to deplay their faith by the performance of good works in the hope of an eternal reward, and to enjoy at all the guidance and help of posters duly called and ordanied. In spite of all the abuses which on sted, their Cataolic forebears had never been deprived of these halps.

Many Protestante were driven by such considerations to return to the Church. Of this Nicheles Amedorf com dained. Many, he says, "have fallen away from Christ to Antichrist in concequenes of such despair and doubts," and the uncertainty in matters of forth is nourseled by the want of any screty in teach ing, so that the people " do not know whom or what to believe", " this was also one of the reasons alleged by Simile Pauli why "many in the Netherlands and in Austria are now relaying into

Popery, "1

We find numerous instances in our day," Laurence Albertus said in 1574, "of how, in many places where Catholics and eccurrent his together no one was able to help a poor, deluded sectorion in spiritual or temporal distress, save the Cathone Christians, and represelly their priests, such present who have been helped admit that they first found rest confort among the Catholics, and now refuse to be discharged to the Church any longer." Albertus wrote a "Defence" of such converts.*

Johann Schlegenhausen, Lather's pupil, with the statements he makes concerning his own and interior experiences, brings on back to his master ! Mchiagrabaufen hunself, even more than the Past, fell a proy to audience, fear and throughte of despair on account of his nine. Luther, to whom he freely confided this, told him it was "false that God hated miners, otherwise Ho would not have sent His 5on "; God hated only the self-righteous "who didn't want to be anners." If Betan had not tried and persecuted me so much, "I should not now be so hostile to him." Bitlan dentes, however, was qualify to convince himself as readily that all his trouble carre from the devil and not from his cornecionce. He said to Luther t " Doctor, I can't believe that it is only the dead who causes andress, for the Law (the corneroustion of tusing infringed it | makes the conscience said, but the Law is good, for it comes from God, consequently neither is the eadnow from Sates." Luther was only able to give an evenion answer and fell back on the proximity of the Last Day as a belingedaulen, "Aufzeichtig" pp. 9, 70, 88.

Op. cst. Magdeburg, 1584, p. 733.

¹ "Fünff fürnemliche Zeichen vor dem jüngsten Tag," Jone. 1154 BL B C.

^{*} Vertbatigung deren, so sich deser Zeit zömischen Kirchen lageben," Dilangen, 1574, p. 72 f. on den Frod der source of consolation: "In short, why we are so plagued, vexed and troubled is due to the Last Day. . . . The devil feels his kingdom is coming to an end, hence the fusa he makes. Therefore, my dear Turbicida i.e. Schlaginhaufen), be comforted, hold fast to the Word of God, let us pray. "Such words, however, did not suffice to calm the troubled man, who on y became ever more dejected; his inference appeared to him only too well founded: "The Law with its obligations and its terrifying menaces is just as much God's as the Gospel."

" How deleful you look," Luther said to him some weeks later. "I replied," so Schlaginhaufen relates : " 'Ah, dear Doctor, 1 was brooding; my thoughts worry me and yet I can do nothing. I am unable to distinguish between the Law and the Gospel.' The Doctor replied: 'Yes, dear Moster Hans, if you could do that then you would be indeed a Doctor yourself, asying which he stood up and doffed his cap. . . . * Psur and I have never been able to get so far . . . the best thing to do is to hold fast to the man Who is called Christ." In answer to a new objection Luther referred the young man to the secret counsels of God, for, according to him, there was a hidden God Who had not revealed Hunself and of Whom men "were unable to know what He secretly planned," and a revealed God Who indeed speaks of a Divine Will that all should be saved; how, however, this was to afford any consciention it is not easy to see. 1. On other occasions Luther simply ordered Schlaginhaufen to rely on his authority; God Himself was speaking through him words of command and consolation. "You are to believe without doubting what God Hunself has spoken to you, for I have God's authority and commission to speak to and to comfort you."2

Behlaginhaufen, "Aufzeichn," p. 21.

Luther to Count Albert of Mansfeld, Dec. 8, 1542, "Briefe," 5, D. 514, Cp. vol. n., pp. 296 and 268 f

CHAPTER XXV

IN THE NARROWER CIRCLE OF THE PROPESSION AND FAMILY LUTHER'S BETTER PEATURES

1. The University Professor, the Prescher, the Paster

Relations with the Wittenberg Students.

Among the pleasing traits in Luther's picture a prominent one is the care he evinced for the students at Wittenberg.

The disagreeable impression caused by the decline of the University town is to some extent mitigated by the efforts Luther made to check the corruption amongst the scholars of the University. He saw that they were supervised, so far as academic freedom permitted, and never hesitated to blame their excesses from the pulpit. At the same time, in spite of the growing multiplicity of his labours and cares, he showed himself a helpful father to them even in temporal matters, for instance, when he inveighed in a sermon against their exploitation at the hands of burghers and peasants: They were being sucked dry and could scarcely be treated worse; this he had heard from all he knew.

The respect he enjoyed and the example of his own simple life lent emphasis to his moral exhortations. His eloquent lectures were eagerly listened to; his delivery was vivid and impressive. People knew that he did not lecture for the sake of money and, even at the height of his fame, they gladly pointed to the unassuming life he led at home. He did not expect any marks of respect from the students, greatly as they, and not only those of the theological Faculty, esteemed him. Melanchthon had introduced the custom of making the students stand when Luther entered the class-room; Luther, however, was not at all pleased with this innovation and said petulently: "Dora, dora est magna nosa; who runs after glory never gets it."

^{1 &}quot; Werke," Weam, ed., 27, p. 418 £, in the sermons of 1526, recently published.

^{*} Mathesias, "Historien," p. 154'; Kroker, "Mathesias Tisch-redes, Emilertung, p. 79.

Oldecop, the Catholic chronicler and Luther's former pupil, who, as a youth and before the apostasy, had listened to him at Wittenberg, remembered in his old age how Luther, without setting lumself in opposition to their youthful jolitications had known how to restrain them; just as he "reproved sin fearlessly from the pulpit," so he earnestly sought to banish temptation from the pleasures of the students.

We may here recall, that, as early as 1520, Luther had urged that all bordes should be done away with, those "public, heathenish haunts of sin," as he termed them, at the same time using their existence as a weapon against the Catholic past." The fact that many such houses were closed down at that time was, however, to some extent due to fear of the prevalent "French disease."

When, in his old age, in 1548, the arrival of certain light women threatened new danger to the morals of the Wittenberg students, already exposed to the ordinary temptations of the town, Luther decided to interfere and make a public onlaught at the University. This attack supplies us with a striking example of his forcefulness, whilst also showing us what curious ideas and expressions he was wont to intermingle with his well-meant admonitions.

"The devil," so he begins, "has, by means of the gainsayers of our faith and our chief fore [presumably the Catholics], sent here certain prostitutes to seduce and ruin our young men. Hence I, so an old and tried proscher, would paternally implore you, my dear children, to believe that the Wicked One has sent these prostitutes hither, who are itchy, shabby, simking and infected with the French disease as, a.m., experience daily proves. Let one good comrade warn the other, for one such infected attumpet can ruin 10, 20, 10, or even 100 sons of good parents and is therefore to be reckined a murderess and much worse than a poisoner. Let one help the other in this poisonous mose, with faithful advice and warning, as each one would himself with to be done by!"

He then threatens them with the penalties of the Ruler, which dissolute students had to fear, "in order that they may take themselves off, and the sooner the better"; "here at Wittenberg] there is a Christian Church and University to which people resort to learn the Word of God, virtue and discipline. Whoever wants to drab had better go elsewhere."

Were he able, he would have such women "bied and broken

Oldecop, "Chronik," ed Euling, p. 40
 Köntlin-Kawerau, 2, pp. 687, 572, n.

on the wheel." Young people ought, however, to resist concupiecence and fight against "their heat"; it was not to no purpose that the Holy (thest had said: "Go not after thy husts " (Eccl. zviu. 30). He concludes: " Pray God Me may send you a proue child [in marriage], there will m any case be trouble enough."1

Some polemics have characterised such exhortations of Luther's as more "hypocriny". Whoever knows his Luther, knows, however, how unfounded is this charge. Nor was there any hypoensy about the other very argent exhortation which Lather cassed to be read from the polpit at Wittenberg in 1542, when himself unable to preach, and which is addressed to both burghers and students. He there implores "the town and the University for Clod's sake not to allow it to be said of them, that, after having heard God's Word so abundantly and for so long, they had grown worse matered of better," "Ah, brother Studium," he says, " spare me and let it not come to this that I be obliged like Polycarp to exclaim, 'O my God, why hast Thou let me live to see this?" He points to his "grizzly head" which at least should mapire respect.

The Preacher and Catechust.

As a preacher Luther was hard-working, may, indefatigable: in this department his readiness of speech, his familiarity with Holy Scripture and above all his popular ways stood him in good stead. At first he preached in the church attached to the monastery; later on his sermons were frequently preached in the parish church, and, so long as his health stood the strain, he sometimes even delivered several sermons a day * Even when not feeling well he took advantage of every opportunity to mount the pulpit. In 1528 he took over the parochial sermons during Bugenhagen's absence from Wittenberg, in spite of being already overworked and ill in body.

All were loud in their praise of the power and vigour of his style. Mathesius in his "Historiea" records a remark to this effect of Mclanchthon's." Luther frequently laid down, after his own fashion, the rules which should guide those who preach to the little ones and the poor in spirit: "Cursed and anotherna be all preachers who treat of high, difficult and subtle matters in the churches, put them to the people and preach on them, seeking their own glory or to please one or two ambitious members of the congregation. When I preach here I make myself as small as possible, nor do I look at the Doctors and Masters, of whom perhaps forty may be present, but at the throng of young people, children and common folk, from a hundred to a thousand strong; it is to them that I preach, of them that I think, for it is they who stand in need."1 And elsewhere : " Like a mother who quiets her bahe, dandles it and plays with it, but who must give it milk from her breast, and on no account wine or Malmsey, so preachers must do the same : they ought so to preach in all simplicity that even the simple-minded may hear, greap and retain their words. But when they come to me, to Master Philip, to Dr. Pommer, etc., then they may show off their learning -and get a good drubbing and be put to shame." But when they parade their learning in the pulpit this is merely done " to impose on and earn the praise of the poor, simple lay folk. Ah, they say, that is a great scholar and a fine speaker, though, probably, they neither understood nor learnt anything "1

Historien, p. 210.

May 13, 1543, "Briefe," § (De Wette and Seidemann), p. 580. 1542, possibly Feb, or Nov. "Briefe," 5, p. 302. Cp, the Rector's exhortation to the students on Feb. 18, 1842, "Corp. ref.," 4, p.

⁷⁸⁶ seq. Colleg "ed Rindse I 3, p. 178. * End desked from meter token at the time.

" Nor should a prencher consider individual members of his congregation and speak to them words of comfort or reproof: what he must seek to benefit is the whole congregation. St. Paul teaches this important doctrine (2 Cor. ii. 17). We speak with sincerity in Christ as from God and before God.' God, Christ and the angels are our hearers, and if we please them that is enough. Let us not trouble ourselves about the world and about private persons! We will not speak in order to please any man nor allow our mouth to be made the 'Arschloch' of another. But when we have certain persons up before us, then we may reprove them privately and without any rancour."a

As a preacher he was able often enough to tell the various classes quite frankly what he found to censure in them At the Court, for instance, he could, when occasion arose, reprove the nobles for their drunkenness, and that in language not of the choicest.4 He was not the man to wear

4 See above, vol. 16., p. 200

¹ He says thus to Pastor Bernard of Dölen, "Werke," Erl. ed., 59, p. 272 f. Cp. Mathesius, "Tachreden," p. 140.

1 "Werke," ibid., p. 273.

Mathesius, "Tischreden," p. 289

232

kid gloves, or, as an old German proverb he himself quoted said, to let a spider spin its web over his mouth. A saving attributed to him characterises him very well, save perhaps in its latter end : Come up bravely, speak out boldly, leave off speedly,1 "I have warned you often enough," so we read in the notes of a Wittenberg sermon of Sep. 24, 1581,2 "to fice fornication, and yet I see that it is again on the increase. It is getting so bad that I shall be obliged to say: Bisty do gurissen, aso lop dich der Teuffl." The preacher then turns to the older hearers, begging them to use their influence with the younger generation, to prevail on them. to abstain from this vice.

As to his subject-matter, he was fond of arging Biblical texts and quotations, wherein he displayed great skill and dexterity. In general, however, his attacks on Poperv are always much the same; he dwells with tiresome monotony on the holiness-by-works and the moral depravity of the Papists. Though his theory of Justification may have proved to him a never-failing source of delight, yet his hearers were inclined to grow weary of it. He himself says once: "When we preach the 'articulum justificationis' the people sleep or cough"; and before this; "No one in the people's opinion is eloquent if he speaks on justification; then they simply close their cars." Had it been a question of retailing stories, examples and allegories he could have been as proficient as any man.4

Mathenus has memporated in his work some of Luther's directions on preaching which might prove a good guide to any pulpit orator desirous of being of practical service to his hearers. Some of these directions and hints have recently appeared in their vigorous original in the Table-Talk. edited by Kroker.

It was his wish that religious addresses in the shape of simple, hearty instructions on the Epistles and Gospela should be given weekly by every father to his family. He himself, in his private capacity, set the example as early as 1532 by holding forth in his own horse on Sundays, when unable to preach in the church, before his assembled household and other guests. This he did, so he said, from a sense of duty towards his family, because it was as necessary to check neglect of the Divine Word in the home as in the Church at large.1

^{} Cp Matheway, "Thehresten," p. 184. " Provincetor ascendate surprovine, aperial of et descend "etc. Sec. de l. No. 3186, when pp. 139 and 196. " Weiner," Weineredt, 34, 2, p. 214.

 Lathers Spirithwörtersammling "ed. B. Their, Weiner, 1900, No. 483. " College "ed. Bindsed, 3, p. 113 seq.

^{* &}quot;Bistozien * pp. 144, 148, 151, etc. " Werke," Erl. ed., 21, p. 31.

He also himself catechised the children at home, in order, as he declared, to fulfil the duties of a Christian father; on rising in the morning he was also in the habit of reciting the "Ten Commandments, the Creed, the Our Father and some Psalm as well " with the children.

He even expressed the opinion that extechetical instruction in church was of little use to children, but that in the home it was more successful and was therefore not to be omitted, however much trouble it might give. however, he adds, that the Papists had neglected such home teaching and had sacrificed the flock of Christ, he is quite wrong. The fact is, that, before his day, it was left far too much to the family to give religious instruction to the children, there being as yet no properly organised Catechism in schools and churches. It was only the opposition aroused among Cathoucs by the religious changes that led to religious teaching becoming more widespread in the Catholic schools, and to a catechetical system being organised; a fuller religious education then served to check the failing away.1 How highly, in spite of such apparent depreciation, he valued the ministerial teaching of the Catechism we learn from some words recorded by Mathesius: "If I had to establish order. I should see that no preacher was numinated who had not previously taught the 'sone aries' and the Catechasm in the schools for from one to three years. Schools are also temples of God, hence the olden prophets were at once pastors and schoolmasters "4" "There is no better way," he writes, "of keeping people devout and faithful to the Church than by the Catechism."4

At Wittenberg an arrangement existed, at any rate as Köstlin-Kawerau, 2, p. 265.

Lauterbach, "Tagebach," p. 82,

The lack of religious instruction in the schools is confirmed by Falk, "Die plarramtischen Auserchbungen des Florentius Diel zu Maing [1491-1518]," 1904, p. 17,

"Historien," 12 Predigt

To Margrave George of Brandenburg, Sep. 14, 1531, "Werke," Erl. ed., 54, p. 253 (" Briefwechsel," 9, p. 193, early as 1528,1 by which, every quarter, certain days were set apart for special sermons on the articles of the Catechism.* The Larger and the Smaller Catechism published by Luther (see vol. v., xxxiv., 2) were intended to form the basis of the verbal teaching everywhere. The three courses of sermons preached by Luther at Wittenberg in May, Sep. and Nov., 1526, and since edited by George Buchwald, were arranged to suit the contents of the Greater Catechism and to some extent served Luther as a preparation for this publication. Luther, in the first instance, brought out the Smaller Catechism, as we see from certain letters given by Buchwald, not in book form, but, agreeably with an earlier ecclesiastical practice, on separate sheets in the shape of tablets to hang upon the walls; hence what he said on Dec. 18, 1587, of his being the author of the Catechism, the " tabula " and the Confession of Augsburg.

He displayed great talent and dextenty in choosing the language best suited to his subject. We hear him denouncing with fire and power the vice of usury which was on the increase. He knows how to portray the past and future judgments of God in such colours as to arouse the lukewarm. When treating of the different professions and ways of ordinary life he is in his own element and exhibits a rare gift of observation. On the virtues of the home, the education of children, obedience towards superiors, patience in bearing crosses and any similar ethical topics which presented themselves to him, his language is as a rule sympathetic, touching and impressive; in three wedding sermons which we have of him he speaks in fine and moving words on love and fidelity in the married state.

In addition to his printed sermons, which were polished and amended for the press and from which we have already given many quotations on all sorts of subjects, the hasty, abbreviated notes of his sermons, made by scalous pupils, give us an insight into a series of addresses full of originality,

[·] See vol. v. anaiv. 2

^{*} Cn. O. Cle ners. "Zeitsehinft für KG.," 1909, p. 382.

^{*} Mathemas, "Technolist, p. 352. Agricola had excused himself by saying he had not attacked Latiner but Crossger and Rorer. Lather replied. Constanting stability, conferme Asymptoms, etc., men, non-Cross per new Hamer and Servelou, 1888, 6, on I mattitude to the taking of interest.

 West, 'Ested, 182, pp. 9943, 10545, 192, p. 24345. Openhove, p. 143 outspokenness and striking thoughts. Indeed these notes, which are becoming better known at the present day, frequently render the sermons in all their primitive simplicity far better than do the more carefully arranged printed editions.

Lather, in 1824, preording to one of these sets of notes, spoke on Good Works in the following style: " The Word is given in order that you may awaken ! It is meant to sour you on to do what a good, not that you should kell yourself in security. When fire and would frome together there among a fire, as you in blue manner, must be inflamed). If, however, the effect of the sermon is, that you do not act towards your brother as Christ does towards you, that is a had eign, not, indeed, that you must become a castaway, but that you may go so far as one day to derry the Word. " "The devil knows that ain dom not harm you, but his aim is to tear Christ out of your heart, to make you willconfident and to rob you of the Word. Hence bewere of bring adm under the influence of Grace. Climat is seen with you when you take refuge in Him, whether you be it am or at the hour of death," sto. . 'This is preached to you daily, but we produce no offect. Christ has bosses and flesh, strength and westmens. Let each one see to it that above all be present the faith . . . the Gonnel is presched everywhere, but few indeed understand it. Christ hore with His followers. In the same way right we behave towards the west. And the day will come when at last they will understand like the disciples. But that will never be uness persecution comes."1

Excerpts from Lather's Sermons on Our Lady

In a sermon of 1524 on the Fenst of the Vastation, taken down in Latin by the same resorter and recently published, Lather not only voices the olden view concerning the virtues and previous of the Blemed Virgin but also incidentally, supplies us with a sample of his candour in speaking of the faults of his "You are our roard that now I preach here so arking, I, on the other hand, are surprised that you do not several. There may presidly be a few to whom the preaching is of some avail; but the more I preach, the more ungedlaness increases. It is not my fault, for I know that I have told you all what God gave me to speak). I am not responsible and my consistence is at prace. I have forced you to nothing. We have introduced two colertions. If they are not to your taste, do away with them again. We shall not force you to give even a single penny "1. He then deals with the Gospel of the Feast which records Mary a yest to Education, and the contacts of process with which she greated her country. He draws upt become from it and present the varture and the dignity of the Breard Virgin in a way that does him boxour.

^{* &}quot;Werke," Weirn, ed., 15, p. 437

I bid., p. 641 ff., "Collections" is our amondment for "Lections."

"First of all you see how Mary's faith finds expression in a work of charity. Her faith was not idle but was proved real by her arting as a more mad, seeking out kinsaboth and serving her. Her faith was immense, as we also learn from other trouped realings. Thus a why kinsaboth said to her. "Blowed art thou that hast believed."... This is a true work of faith when impelled thereby we abuse correlives and serve others. We, too, hear all this, but the works are not forthcoming. . . . Yet where there is real faith, works are never absent."

" When Mary was magnified by Etsuboth with words of present, It was as though she did not hose thorn, for the past to hood to them. Every other woman would have succumbed to the temptation of energiery, but she given praise to Him to Whom alone praise is due. From this example all Christians, but purticularly ail presences, ought to learn. You know that God preserves some preachers in a state of grace, but others He permits to fall ... God must preserve them like Mary so that they do not grow proud. When God hestown His gifts upon as it is hard not to become presumptuous and self confident. If, for instance, I am wel, acquainted with Sempture, propie will prame me on the account, and when I am present, I, as a carnel man, om exposed to the fire, when on the centrary I am desposed, sec i.e. this is helpful for my snivation j. . . . Many arted as though she did not henr it, and never even thanked klizatieth for her Britaine."

Mary said, so be continues, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, not myself; I am a more creature of God; He might have eat another in my place, I magnify H m Who has made me a Mother." In this way Mary teaches us the right use of the gifts bestowed by trod, for she rejested only in tend. On the other hand, any women who is even passebly presty becomes vain of herself, and any man who has riches, bosots of his pomessions. Mary is merely provid that God, as one may, has regarded her humility. This is the process which we tax print pay her. We ought to extel her became also was chosen by the Drome Majorty. to be the Mother of His New That, she man, is it be proclaimed to the end of the world [1] all general concatall call me blessed.]. not on her own account, but he age sed has done this. Concerts tog her own good works and her vergraity she was wheat and samply med: "He has done great things in me." In the same way we ought to be nothing in our own eyes and before the world, but to repore amply because that has leaded down on us, conferring that all we have comes from Him. In this spirit Mary counted up great gifts, though the could have each. All that you have just told me in true. "Ah, here was a tree spirit, and her example will neutredly endure. . The whole world will never attain to it, for the soul that is not exalter by God's gifts and depressed by powerty as indeed hard to find." By her words, so the speaker centresiss, Many condemped the world, mand herwill almove it held contait would, her language was not human, but come to her from God.

Through such prace of Mary--from which at a later data Lather densed may be placed to his credit, yet it must be pointed out, that even the above decourse a disfigured by bitter and nawarrantable attacks on Catholic diretrine and practice. He even speaks as though the veneration of Mary did not rest on the principles we have just heard him expound, vol. on the dignity bretewed by Got on Mary as the Mother of God, and on the virtues with which she was endowed from on high, such as faith and humbity. The Catholic Church, so Lather complaint quite unjustly and falsely, had made of Mary a goddese ("fermous over Leven") and had given her bonour and prace without referring it to God.

 Luther must have brown that in Catholic worden the Divine Roa. is more honoured by the renewation of Mary than she herest. That adoration was paid to tend above and not to Many he could see from the test of the prayers of the ancient Church. Lather for materiol. was around sted with the Invitatories of the Office for the Fearts of Mary's Nature to and Assumption, the first of which commences with the words . " Let us resolved the birth of the Virgin Mary " and then at once midd. " Let us ad ee her Son Christ our Lord." mental arts that Lord is the nest place and as in "Come let us adopt the King of Kings Whom Virgin Michel and today assumed into Thus as the Laturgy which he honorif had celebrated, this buding thought, hat threat was beauted in Mary ran through the reletmate a of all per France, from that of her extraore rate true life to that of her exit. The Hamin to the Bother at tood in Luther's day renchaned as they do now. Joseph to There he given, Who want hope of a verying sets. Any advention of the blomed beginnes of a "goddene." was an alors to the process that it would have been rejected with mdiguation.

In the same way that the Invitations just quoted expressly reserve adecation for the Invite has no the veneration of the Bother of took in the Chareh's Offices is pushfied as exactly the same grounds so them when, according to Lather result from the resultery of the bootstom and from the Magnificat. The Church has a wave extelled Mary emply in the spirit of the Magnificat. "Lather houses had published a proceed expension of the Magnificat in 1521. There he still speace of the Historia Virgin in the usual way ("Works" Worm od. 7, p. 565 f.; Er. od. 65 p. 214 f.). At the confriencement of the work he invokes have associated with the world. May the most tender Bitther of took obtain for me the spirit to interpret her way tartially and pract cally that we may sing and chart that Magnificat eternally in the infeto serve. So being in Good. Amon posits 2.4. In the cases way, at the class we expresses has begun that a note transfer of the Magnificat "many not only illuming and teach, but burn and lave in hody and would may Christ grant his this by the intercession and assistance of his dear Mother Mary. Amon " (p. 1001 = 287). Thus he was then still is have routed a set of a new contract the hisy first of look, where a laber to not and a tree contract the hisy and declared it to be one of," the abuses of Autobrast." (See Köntata, "Lastiness Theologie," 12, p. 276 ft.)—Latther wrote his exposition of the Magnification the spiral which reset appears every throughout the stations the randicte, and which had not not a stronger on him during his tations period. At the major time he observed in short to writ upon the wavering and mutious Court of his filector, and for the

The supreme distinction which the Church seknowledges in Mary—viz. her imminculate conception and exemption from original six from the first moment of her soul's existence—Luther himself accepted at first and adhered to for a considerable time, following in this the tradition of his Order.¹

All honour was to be given to Christ as God; this right and preseworthy view, which Luther was indefatigable in expressing, maked him in the matter of the veneration and invocation of Mary and the Sainta. Of this he would not hear, though such had ever been the practice of the Church, and though it is hard to see how God's giory can suffer any designation through the honour paid to His servants. In this Luther went estray; the dogma of the adorshie Divinity of Jesus Christ was, however, always to remain to him asymething sacred and sublime Statements to Luther's advantage from various Instructions. His Language.

In his sermons Luther was so firm in upholding the Divinity of Christ, in opposition to the acepticism he thought he detected in other circles, that one cannot but be favourably impressed. He was filled with the livelest sense of man's duty of submitting his reason to this mystery, he even goes too far, in recommending abdication of the intellect and in his disparagement of human reason; what remon deducated this work, which though perceful in tone contained hidden errors to Prince Johann Frederick in a submission letter. It should be noted that Lather wrote this deducation soon after receiving his automatic Wilson. It is dated March 10, 1521 (that, p. 545 - 212. Cp. "Birefwechsel," 3, p. 109).

He admitted this besief handed down in the Catholic Schools, though not proplained a dogma till much later in the sermen ha prescived in 1527 for the day of the Conception of Mary the Mother of that " ... " It is a moved and purity he sel that the influence of Mary's and was effected without original air are that in the very infusion of her some one was also purified from original mit and adorned with God's gifts, reversing a pure soul infinied by G. et ... thus from the first moment able began to nive she was free from all ain." (... Werke," Let .ed., 15°. . 58). The sermon was taken down is notes and published with Luther's approval. The same statements concerning the Immaculate Conception at it remain in a printed edition published in 1529, but in the later editions which appeared during Lichera lifetime they disapprox. (t.p. N. Puntus. Lat. Best der Koln Volumtng. 1906. No. 41 i. In a work of 1528 he says. Mary not only hept God a comrandments perfectly but also "received so much grace that she was quite blied with it, so we believe" ("Rationic Latomiana confuters." "Werke," Werm, ed., 8. p. 56; "Opp. lat. var.," 7, p. 416) As Luther a intellectual and ethical development progressed we cannot naturally expect the sublime picture of the pure Mother of God, the type of a resulty of the spirit of mersics and of marriety to furnish mis great attraction for him and as a matter of fact such statements as the above are no longer met with in his later works.

he is anxious to do is to make all his religious feeling culminate in a trusting faith in the words · " God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son for us."

In his sermons and instructions he demands a similar yielding of reason to faith with regard to the mystery of Christ's Presence in the Sacrament, though in this case be had not shrunk from twisting the doctrine to suit his own ideas. It would hardly be possible to maintain more victoriously against all gainsavers the aced of standing by the literal sense, or at least of excluding any figurative interpretation of, the words of institution "This is My Body," than Luther did in many of his pronouncements against the Sacramentarians.1

With advancing years, and in view of the dissensions and confusion prevailing in the Reformed camp, he came to insist more and more on those positive elements, which, for all his aversion for the ancient Church, he had never ceased to defend. Of this we have a monument in one of his last. works, vis. the " Kurtz Bekentnis," to which we shall return later. Embittered by the scepticism apparent in Zwinglianism and elsewhere, which, as he thought, threatened to sapall religion, he there obeys his heart's instincts and gives the fullest expression to his faith in general and not merely to his belief in Christ's presence in the Sacrament.

Concerning the Sacrament of the Altar he gave the following noteworthy answer to a question put to himjointly, in 1544, by the three princely brothers of Anhalt, vis. whether they should do away with the Elevation of the Sacrament in the liturgy. "By no means," he replied, " for such abrogation would tend to diminish respect for the Sacrament and cause it to be undervalued. When Dr. Pommer abolished the Elevation lat Wittenberg, in 1542] during my absence, I did not approve of it, and now I am even thinking of re-introducing it. For the Elevation is one thing, the carrying about of the Sacrament in procession quite another [at Wittenberg Luther would not allow such processions of the Sacrament]. If Christ is truly present in the Bread (' us pane'), why should He not be treated with the utmost respect and even be adored? "-Josekim, Prince of Anhalt, added, when relating this:

Ibid., Erl. ed., 32, pp. 397–425.

¹ "Weeks," Weem, ed., 23, pp. 64-302, Etl. ed., 30, pp. 16-150.

 We now how Lather bowed low at the Elevation with great devotion and reverently worshipped Christ.

Certain controversalists have undoubtedly been in the trong in making out Lather to have been proposed about, or even appeared at heart to, many of the ground digress which he never attacked, for instance, the Tranty, or the Decemby of Christ. A few vague and menutions statements accommonly let slip by him are more than countertailmored by a wealth of others which tell in involp of his faith, and he have if would have been the institution the unfortunate inference drawn more or less rightly from certain proconitions emitted by him. It is a arrive thing, that, in artical his, ever almost always claims the right of not bring bound draw ten tightly in the chains of lapse. When Lie her for testiance, made every man judge of the minerage of the Bible, he was setting up a principle when must have dissolved all common between Christians, and thus, of receiving he was compelled to limit, summethat Bayensley, the application of the principle.

In a passage frequently cried against him, where he shows furnielf second with the ancient term employed by the Church to express the Bon's being of the same substance with the Father ("homeouser"), it was not his intention to rail against the doctron therein expressed but merely to take exception to the word. He explicitly distinguishes between the word and the thing ("securedam of me ... He mays that, as long as see bolds fact to the deciror (" mode or a tream.) scripturally defend by the Nicone Counci, it was no burnly to distille the word or to refere to oursley it. Hence the passage affects no ground for easing, that " Luther was rush enough to tamper with the doctrons of the Person of Christ". On the other hand, the new doctron of the emagressons of the Body of Christ evolved by has during the sentroversy on the Secrement, can precely be considered greditable.* His views on the "communicatio whoreason "* in Christ, and particularly on the Redemption, also cortain contradictions act to be explained away.

Contraryons we must discuss the charge based on his repugcance for the word." Threefoldhood," by which Germans designate the Trusty at if this time ved antageneous on his part to the mystery stealf. He was referring enough to the term when he ends: "It is not particularly good torsion and does not mound will, but more it cannot be an several upon, we must speak in limit we can. * An universalise restreaces of faith in the Trimity is contained in this very passage, and in countless others to: When a decreating the Largey he indeed emitted the transcation." Service Translate man I had, "but this was not from any host by to the decrease but from a wall not to have." Income

¹ Mathemas, "Tischreden," p. 341.

^{*} Werne, Weim, ed., 5, p. 117 f.; "Opp Jat. var," 5, p. 506 seg.

Kontin, Lathers Theologie, 1 25, p. 145 f. 4 Had., p. 192 ff.
 It d. pp. 149 5(0)

Werke," Erl. ed., 12 p. 1 f. ; 121, p. 406

many words." He left in their old places the separate invocations of the Father, Sun and Holy Gloss, and deemed this quite sufficient.

By his retention of the belief in the three Divine Persons and in the Divinity of the Redeemer, Luther was instrumental in preserving among his future followers a treasure inherited from past ages, in which not a few have found their consolation. We must not be unmindful of how he strove to defend it from the assaults of unbelief, in his time still personified in Judaism. He did not sin by debasing the Second Person of the Trinity, but rather by foisting on God Incarnate attributes which are not really His; for instance, by arguing that, owing to the intimacy of the two Natures, Divine and Human, in Christ, His Haman Nature must be as omnipresent as His Divine, or, again, by teaching that mere belief in one's redemption and sanctification suffices to destroy sin; or, again, when his too lively eschatological fancy led him to see Christ, the Almighty conqueror of the devil and his world, already on the point of coming to the Judgment. And just as Christ's Godhead was the very fulcrum of all his teaching, so he defended likewise the other Articles of the Apostles' Creed with such courage, force and eloquence, as, since his death, few of his followers have found themselves capable of. About the Person of the Redeemer he wove all the usual Christological doctrines. His Virgin Birth, His truly muraculous Resurrection, His descent into Hell, His Ascension and Second Advent; finally, also, the resurrection of the dead, the future Judgment, and the everlasting Heaven and everlasting Hell. From the well-spring of the ancient creed. under God's Grace. Lutherans without number have drawn and still continue to draw motives for doing what is good. consolation amidst affliction and strength to lead pious lives.

"What homess, devotion and heroic virtue do we not find among non-Catholics. God's Grace is not confined within the four walls of the Catholic Church, but breathes even in the hearts of outsiders, working in them, when opportunity affords, the miracle of justification and adoption, and thus ensuring the eternal solvation of countless multitudes who are either entirely ignorant of the true Church, as are the upright heathen, or mistake her true form and nature as do countless Protestants, brought up amidst the crassest prejudice. To all such as these the Church does not close the gates of Heaven " (J. Pohle),

It would be superfluous to enumerate amongst Luther's favourable traits the respect he always paid to Holy Scripture as the Word of God, demanding for its infalible revelations a willing faith and the merifier of one's own whims.

Greatly as he acred in wilfully applying his new, subjective principle of interpretation and in size using certain of the Sacred Flooks, still the Hibie steelf be always declared to be an object of the highest reverence. Thanks to a retentive memory he made his own the words of Scripture, and even adopted its style. His "enthusiang for the mexhaustible riches and Divine character of Holy Scripture," of which the earlier Dollinger speaks, has, and with some reason, been held up by Luther a followers as the model, nav. the pariedium of Luthernaum as a whole; on the other hand, however, Dollinger's accompanying censure on Lather's "arbitrary masses" of the Hible-text must also commend itself. not only to Catholice but to every serious student of the Bible. High prace for Luther's acquaintance with Scripture combined with severe blame for his deviation from tradition are forthcoming from a contemporary of the early years of Lather's public career. In a short, unprented and anonymous work entailed "Urted aber Luther," now in the Musich State Library, we read: "In the fine art of the written Word of God, s.e. the Bible, I hold Martin Luther to be the most learned of men, whether of those now aving on earth or of those who have departed long mace, he as moreover, well versed in the two languages, both Latur and Gorman. I do not, however, regard him as a Christian. —for to be learned and elegment is not to be a Christian—but as a heretic and achismatic "; he was, it adds, "the scourge of an magry God."*

In the field of semptural activity his German translation of the whole Bible has procured for him enduring fame. Since the birth of Humanism not a few scholars had drawn attention to the languages in which the Bible was originally written; Luther, however, was the first who ventured to make a senious attempt to produce a complete translation of all the Sacred Books on the basis of the original text.

Thanks to his German version, from the languistic point of view so excellent, Protestants down to our own day have been familiar with the Bible. His rendering of the Bible stories and doctrines, at once so able and so natural, was a gain not only to the language of religion but even to profane literature, just as his writings generally have without question largely contributed to the furtherance of the German longue.

Dollinger, "Luther, eine Skitze," p. 56; "KL.," 5°, col. 343, "Cod. germ. Monaccass," 4842, Bl. 1, 2'.

The scholarly Caspar Cleanerg, uniting on this subject from the Catholic age in the 14th century, expresses howelf most forourably. "What Lather," he says, "after consisting the recognized spinson of Holgow and Greek expects, took to be the true meaning of the text under the meson, that he clothed is pure and stegant terrings, on the cultivation of which he had ad his life bestowed great care. He had made such progress to the art of writing, true hing and expounding, that, if we take into conenderation the beauty and the brilliance of his language, so free from artifree, as well as the originality of his expression, we must allow that he excelled all is the use of the German tongue so that none can compare with him. Thus it was that he gained so uncanny are efforce over the bearts of his Germans, that, by curves ng and flattering and using the allurements of the Div no Word, he could make them believe whatever he pleased. In this translation of the Bible bewas, above all, at pains, by means of a certain singance and charm of speech, to entire all to become his renders, and thus to win men's beacts "!

Luther cannot sedeed be called the creater of New-High-German, astner by remon of his translation of the 2hble or of his other German writings. Not, using as he did the sirendy existing treasure of the language with such abbity, his influence on the Gormon larguage was percentally very great, especially as, owing to the great spread of his writings in those early days of printing, his works were practically the first in the aterary field, and, indeed, in many places excluded all others. "Leither a importance as regards the language," declares one of the most recent students of the matter, " is less apparent in the details of grammar, in which he is sometimes rather backward, than in the general effect of his exections on behalf of New-High-German." It is of small importance, the came writer remarks, "if in the more wealth of cussmon ideans one or other of the towns even within the confines of his native Saxon land -Grinna, Leipzig. Dreaden—were in advance of the language resployed by Lather "

Luther's translation of the Bible will be treated of more in detail elsewhere (vol. v., xxxiv., 0). Here, however, mention may be made of the fine quality of the German used in his sermons, his theological and polemical writings, as well as in his popular works of devotion.

A "Ceach Lightern." Corman addison, Mayonon 1838, p. 463 f.
B R Gutjube, " Zaz Entarching der neutusbosstachen Seneftsproche"; " hturken zur deutschen Rechtss and Sprachgrech." 2, Leipzig, 1906.

The figures and comparisons in which his sparkling fancy delights, particularly in the devotional booklets intended for the common people, his popular, sympathetic and often thoughtful adaptation of his language to the subject and to the personality of the reader, the truly German stamp of his phraseology, lending to the most difficult as well as to the most ordinary subjects just the clothing they require all this no one can observe and enjoy without paying tribute to his gift of description and language.

* His vocabulary was strong and incluve," Johannes Jamesen. truly remarks, "his style full of life and movement, his nimiles, in their naked plainness, were instinct with vigour and went straight to the mark. He drow from the rich mines of the vernacular tongue, and in popular eloquence and oratory few equalled him. Where he still spoke in the spirit of the Catholic past his language. was often truly sublime. In his works of instruction and edification he more than once reveals a depth of religious group which reminds one of the days of German mysticsen.

His first pupils could not sufficiently extel his gift of language. Justus Jones in his panegyric on Luther declares, though his words are far-fetched: "Even the Chanceron have learnt from him, at least in part, to speak and write correct German; for he revived the use of the German language so that now we are again. able to speak and wate it accurately, as many a person of degree must testify and witness." And of the influence of his spoken. words on people's minds Hieronymus Weller declares, that it had been said of him, his words " made each one fancy he could see into the very hearts of those troubled or tempted, and that he could heal wounded and broken spirita."

The Spiritual Guide.

Not merely as professor, preacher and writer, but also as spiritual leader, did Luther exhibit many qualities which add to the attraction of his picture. Whatever may be the habits of polemical writers, the historian who wishes to seguit himself properly of his task must not in so momentous " Hist. of the German People" (Eng. Trans.), 3, p. 238. " Leichenrode" of Feb. 19, 1546, commencement, Werke," ed. Walch, 21, p. 302* ff.

* Wellers Deutscho Schriften," Tl. 3, p. 215. Before this Weller remarks. * For he was equal to the greatest prophets and Aposton an sparst, strength, wisdom, ability and experience." He attributes to him "a prophetical spirit, notable strength, generosity and a power of faith such as we read existed in the prophet Elias. . . . " Great persecutions and temptations had been his masters and teachers; triey it was who had taught him the art of speaking.

a matter evade the duty of depicting the favourable as well as the unfavourable adea of Luther's character.

Though Luther did not regard himself as the pastor of Wittenberg, yet as much depended on him there as if he had actually been the regular minister; moreover, as was only to be expected, throughout the Saxon Electorate as well as in other districts won over to him, he exercised a certain sway. As can be proved from his letters and other documents, he freely offered his best services, if only for the good repute of the Evangel, to abolish seandals, to punish preachers who led bad lives, to promote attendance at public worship and the reception of communion, to help on the cause of the schools and the education of the young, and in every other way to amend the Christian hfc.

In order to revive discipline at Wittenberg, he tried the effect of excommunication, though with no very conspicuous success. He took the brave step of placing the Town Commandant, Hans Metzsch, under a sort of han for his notorious disregard of the Church. What he then told the congregation was calculated to inspire a wholesome dread, and to recall them to their duties towards God and their neighbour. The incident was likely to prove all the more effectual seeing that Luther had on his side both Town Council and congregation, Metzsch having previously fallen out with them, a fact which undoubtedly emboldened Luther.

When Antinomianism, with its perilous teaching against the binding character of the Divine Law, strove to strike root in the Saxon Electorate, he set himself with unusual vigour to combat the evil, and in his writings, sermons and letters set forth principles worthy of being taken to heart concerning the importance of the Commandments and the penis of self-will. Similar edifying traits are apparent in his struggle with other "Rotters." In the climination of the sectarian element from the heart of the new faith and instancing its dangers, he shows himself very emphatic, and, at times, the force of his reasoning is minutable. Neither was he slow to find practical measures to ensure its extirpation, especially when it threatened the good name and stability of his work.

Above, p. 210.  Collog., ed. Bindseil, 1, pp. 27, 27

^{*} On the inner connection between his own teaching and Anthron's same and on his controversy with Agricois, see vol. v., kaix , 2 and 3

He exercised many of the other labours of his manustry by means of his writings; with the kerp of his pen and the press, he, in his quality of spiritual guide, attacked all the many-sided questions of life, seeking to impart instruction to his followers wherever they might chance to be. No one so far had made such use of the newly invented art of printing for the purpose of exerting religious influence and for spiritual government.

He despatched a vast number of circular-letters to the congregations, some with detailed and fervent exhortations; his Postils on the acriptural Lessons for the Sundays and Feast Days he scattered far and wide amongst the masses; he was also interested in good books on profane subjects, and exhorted all to assist in the suppression of obscene romances and tales; he also set to work to purify Æsop's Fables-which, under Humanist influence, had become a source of corruption-from fifthy accretions so that they might be of use in the education of the young.! The collection of German Proverbs which he commenced was also intended to serve for the instruction of youth.*

He justly regretted that amongst the Legends of the Saints current amongst the people there were many historical untruths and impossibilities. Many of his remarks on these stories do credit to his entical sense, particularly as in his time very few had as yet concerned themselves with the revision of these legends. It was far from advantageous to ecclesiastical literature, that, in spite of the well-grounded objections raised by Luther and by some Catholic scholars, deference to old-standing tradition allowed such fictions to be retained and even further enhanced. "It is the devil's own plague," Luther groans, "that we have no reliable legends of the Saints. . . . To correct them is an onerous task." "The legend of St. Catherine," he says on the same occasion to his friends, " is quite at variance with Roman history. Whoever concocted such a tale must now assured y be sitting in the depths of hell."4 He goes, however, too far when he says that the insecuracies were intentional, "infamous" lies devised by Popery, and adds: "We never dared to protest against them."-As though such literary and often poetic outgrowths of a more childlike age were not to be regarded as merely harmless, and as though entireism had been prohibited by the Church. It is true, nevertheless, that criticism had not been sufficiently exercised, and if Luther's undertaking and the controversies of the 16th century helped to arouse it, or, rather, to quicken the efforts already made in this direction, first in the field of Bible-study and Church-history and then, more gradually, in that of popular legendary and devotional literature, no wise man can acc therein any cause for grief.

Cp. Köstlin-Kawerau, Z, p. 504.
 E. Thiele, 'Luthers Sprichwörtersamml.," Weimar, 1900.
 Mathesius, " ohreden," p. 346. * See vol. v., xxxiv., 2.

"An die Radherm aller Stedte deutsches Lands, das sie christliche Schulen auffrichten und halten sollen " is the title of one of Luther's writings of 1524, in which he urges the erection of schools with such vigour that the circular in question must be assigned a high place among his hortatory works: "With this writing Luther will recapture the affection of many of his opponents," wrote a Zwickan schoolmaster after reading it.1 "Ob Kriegsleutte auch ynn seligem Stande seyn künden" (1526) is the heading of another broadsheet of his, dealing with the secular sword, the divinely established "office of war" and the rights of the authorities. For this Luther made use of Augustine's work "Contra Faustum manichaum." It is said that part of the proofs, without any author's name, was put into the hands of Duke George of Saxony; thereupon he remarked to Lucas Cranach: "See, I have here a booklet which is better than anything Luther could do."8 At a later date Luther arged the people in eloquent words to take up arms against the Turk, though he had at first been opposed to resistance; nevertheless, he ever maintained his unfavourable attitude towards the Empire, already described in vol. iii., even on this question of such vital importance to Cermany. He was relentless in his criticism of German unpreparedness for war, of the fatal habit of disregarding danger and of other possible sources of disaster; he also advanced religious motives for joining in the war, and exhorted all the faithful bravely to assist by their prayers.

Whilst these and other writings deal with practical

1903, p. 125.

* Köntim-Kawerau, 2, p. 10.

^{* &}quot; Brede an Stephun Roth " ed. Buchwold (" Archiv des deutschen. Bushhandels, 16, 1893), p. 37; Köstlin-Kaweratt 1, p. 548 questions affecting public life in which his position and religious ideas entitled him to interfere, a large number of works and pamphlets are devoted to domestic and private needs. In his "Trost für die Weibern welchen es ungerat gegangen ist mit Kinder Geberen " (1542) he even has a kind word for such wives as had had a miscarriage, and consoles those who were troubled about the fate of their unbaptised infants. From the theological point of view this subject had, however, been treated better and more correctly by others before his day. He was also at his post with words of direction and sympathy whea pestilence threatened, as his writing "Ob man fur dem Sterben fliehen muge" (1527) bears witness. He frequently composed Prefaces to books written by others, in order to encourage the authors and to help on what he considered useful works; thus, for instance, he wrote a commendatory Introduction to Justus Menius's "Œconomia Christiana" (1520).

L. Cardauna, "Die Lebes vom Wielerstande des Volkes," Bonn

The New Form of Confession.

Lather's pastoral experience convinced him that Confession was conducive to the maintenance and furtherance of religious life. He accordingly determined to re-introduce it in a new shape, i.e. without invalidating the doctrines be had preached concerning faith and freedom. Hence, at times we find him speaking almost like an apologist of the Church concerning this practice of earlier ages and its wholesome effects. He insists, however, that no confession of all mortal sins must be required, nor ought Confession to be made a duty, but merely counselled.

In his work "Von der Beicht, ob der Bapst Macht habe zu gepieten" (1521) he begins one section with the words; "Two reasons ought to make us ready and willing to confess," which he then proceeds to expound quite in the manner of the olden Catholic works of instruction." E.sewhere he expresses his joy that Confession had been bestowed on the Church of Christ, especially for the relief of troubled consciences; Confession and Absolution must not be allowed to fall into disuse; to despise so costly a treasure would be criminal.

Of Luther himself it is related again and again, that, after having confessed, he received "Absolution," either from Pastor Bugenhagen of Wittenberg or from someone else.

^{1 &}quot;Werke," Wesn ed S, p. 176; Ed ed , 27, p. 267

The words Absolution and Confession must not, however, as already hinted, be allowed to mislead those accustomed to their Catholio sense. Sometimes in Catholic works we read quotations from Luther which convey the wrong impression, that he had either retained the older doctrine practically entire, or at least wished to do so. So little is this the case, that, on the contrary, when he mentions Confession it is usually only to rail at the "slavery" of conscience and the spiritual tyranny of the past. Absolution, according to him, could be received "from the lips of the pastor, or of some other brother "# Even the ordinary preaching of the Gospel to the faithful he considers as "fundamentally and at bottom an 'absolutio' wherein forgiveness of sine is proclaimed." In Confession there was no "Sacrament" in the sense that Baptism and the Supper were Sacraments, but merely "an exercise of the virtue of Baptism," an set in which the simple Word became a means of grace. The Word was to arouse and awaken in the heart of the Christian the assurance of forgiveness. The faith of the penatent is the sole condition for the appropriation of the Divine promises. Of the way in which Luther in the Smaller Catechism nevertheless emphasises the significance of the Absolution given by the confessor, Julius Kostlin says: "These statements of Luther's are in several ways lacking in clearness."*

I must, in my trouble, Luther says elsewhere of Confession, neek for comfort from my brother or neighbour, and " whatever consolation he gives me se ratified by God in heaven [erest solute sa cesto ' (Mat. xvni. 18)]"; "He consoles me in God's stead and God Himself speaks to me through him." "When I receive absolution or seek for comfort from my brother," then "what I hear is the voice of the Holy Chost Himself." " It is a wonderful thing, that a minuter of the Church or any brother

Cp vel i., pp. 390 ff., 278 ff., 384 f.; vol. ii., p. 50 ff.
 Köstlin, "Luthers Theologic," 22, p. 35.; "Opp. lat. sees." 9, p 23; "Werks," Weint, ad., 26, p. 220; Ed. ed., 23, p. 40 f ; 44, ^{4 &}quot;An den Rat zu Numberg, Gutachten Luthers und Meisrebthons " (April 18, 1533); "Werke," Erk ed., 55, p. 8 "Briefwechsel." 9, p. 202).

* Kostlin, ibid., p. 252 f.

^{* &}quot; Worke," Erl ed., 21, p. 17 f.

Körtkin, ibid., p. 249.

abould he "minister rogal Del at enter astrona, comissionis guera-

But all such prevate exercise of the power of the keys notwithstanding, the public exercise by the ordinary ministers of the Church was also to be held in honour; it was to take place "when the whole body of the Church was seconded. I In space of the opposition of some he was always in favour of the greenal absolution being given during the service.* In this he followed: the sider practice which out exists, according to which, out of devotion and not with any idea of imparting a engrament, the "Muse catur" and "Indulgentiam" were and over the names blood faithful after they had said the "Conferer". He also drew up a special form for this general confession and absolutaon.*

But even such public Confermen was not, however, to be made obligatory; the very nature of Lather's system feebade his acting up rules and obligations. In the present matter Luther rould not sufficiently emphasise the Christian's freedom, although this freedom, as man is constituted, could not but render impossible any reality practical results. Hence Confession, private as well as public, was not to be presented, so much so that "those who prefer to contess to find alone and theresiter receive the barrament" are " quite at liberty to do so." For Confewton was after all merecy a general or particular confession al trouble of encurrence or unfulress, made in order to obtain an assurance that the sire were all forgives.

It was, however, of the atmost supportance that the penitents should decline whether they knew all that was necessary shout Christ and His naving Word, and that otherwise they should be ⁶ "Werlet," Ert. ed., 44, p. 107 ff., 46, p. 292; "Opp. int. exeg.," 11, p. 136. See also Kentur. Seef. p. 256. Atmilistrate may also be next. by one for away, as Luther wrote to Spalatin: "Audi et crede ise giot Christian per me tille inquistur. Negue costs eria, qual aria, aut potonic a loguer. Cariotica form the per me. Expect of featratio. In communit fule in even creden. I pre almolish to ab har percuto et amusbus," Aug 24, 1544, " Briefe," ed De Wette, 5, p. 680, 1 Joid, 44, p. 100.

At Novemberg Douarder had opposed the general absolution, and then, in mule of a memorardum from Waterdays to the centrary fabove, p. 348, m. 3), permited in his represention to high the magnificance made another application to Wittenland in Sep. 27 (Briefwechael," B p. 33") and again got a arm at reply ... Werke " Erl ed. 55, p. 37; F p 33") and assument a mini or reply . Werke "Erl ed 55, p. 27; "Briefweeheel," S, p. 343). In the new "memorandum "it was also. stated that the justice and the presale atmobiliers were real absolutions; that Character was not to be compared to give the gereral absolution.

4 " Briefweched," 12, p. 208. Form of Absolution dated Feb. 18, 1340, for the Normalergen. The editor remarks. The questiona de point in this firm, kip, that the Atsolution was attached to an e entirectly (should find to day or to mornin call one of you from this vale of tears ,, and might thus be regarded as valid only in this event, one merely be hinted at here."

Those words were added by Luther in 1530 to his! Unterricht der Visitatorn." (1528); "Werke," Wenn, ed., 26, p. 220; Erl. ed., 23 p. 40 f. Kastin, ibal., p. 251.

mitrarted. " [[Christians are able to give an account of their faith," Luther mys in 1540 of the practice presenting as Wittenburg, "and ductor an earnest deure to enceye the foccument, their we do not con put them to make a private Confession or to stramerate their and. For instance, nobody thinks of compelling Master Philip (Metanchthon). "Our main reason for retaining Confession in for the private rehugeal of the Catecham "1

In 1612 and det the disturbance caused by Dienvieue Melander. the Zenarian faction around the upper hand at Frankfest on the Mains, and the preschers, supported by the so ended fanation, condevanced and monked at the Confromon, which, preceding to the Simplier Cates uses, were to be made to a conferent, to be duly mildreused as " Year Reverence, " Lushor, in his "Brieff on dissu Francidort am Moyn ' (Due 1832), generdingly set forth his kiegs on Confession, in what manner it was to be retained and randered metal 1. " We do not been assome to go to Confermen, he there writes, " as al. our writings prove, just as we do not empires who evjects our Cutecham and our teaching ". He had no with to drive proud spirite "auto Christ a Kingdom by force." As agreement the self-environment of all mostal man required in Popery to had introduced a "great and sublime freedom" for the quarting of Tagon and consciences 1, the perstant need only conferm " some few man which appress has much, even this in but required of "those who know what an ready is," " his our Paster [Hagewhagen] and our Vicar, Master Philip " " Hot. because of the dear young people who are daily growing up and of the common felk who understand but little, we retain the touge in order that they may be trained in Christian discipline and understanding. For the object of such Confession is not metric that we may bear the sins, but that we may learn whether they are acquainted with the Our Father, the Creed, the Ten Commandments and all that is comprised in the Catechion. Where can this be better done, and when is it more neversity than whom they are about to approach the formment ?"!

"Thus, previously [to the Su yes], the common people are to he examined and made to my what ser they know the articles of the Catechiem and understand what it is to an against treve, and if they will for the future from more and americ, and starwise are not to be admitted to the Sacrament." But if a postor who m unable at all tenes and places to preach God's Word to the people, takes advantage of such time and place as offers when they come to Confermen, my't there put the devil of a row! As if, foreight, he neve acting contrary to bod a command, and as if those fanguing were mante, who would prevent him from teaching God a Word at such a time and place, when in reality we are bound to toneh it in all pinces and at all times when or wheresoover we can, "14

* I* 046 II = 351 IF * P. 547 1 = 303, 385,

Mathenus, "Tischroden," p. 185.
 "Weeke," Weim, ed., 30, 3, p. 656 ff; Erl. ed., 26°, p. 378 (Bretwectori, ' 9, p. 251c.

This matruetion, which is the "main reason " for retaining Confession, is to be followed, according to the same letter, by " the Absolutio" promounced by the preacher in God's stead, i.e. by the word of the confessor which may "comfort the heart and confirm it in the faith." Of this same word Luther says: "Who is there who has climbed so high as to be able to dispense with or to despise God's Word ? "1

It is in the light of such explanations that we must appreciate the fine things in praise of Confession, so frequently quoted, which Luther says in his letter to Frankfurt.

Luther goes on to make an admission which certainly does him honour: "And for this |the consolation and strength it affords] I myself stand most in need of Confession, and neither will nor can do without it; for it has given me, and still gives me daily, great comfort when I am sad and in trouble. But the fanatics, because they trust in themselves and are unacquainted with sadness, are ready to despise this medicine and soluce."

He had already said. "If thousands and thousands of worlds were mine. I should still prefer to lose everything rather than that one little bit of this Confession should be lost to the churches. Nay, I would prefer the Popish tyranny, with its feasts, fasts, vestments, holy places, tonsures, cowls and whatever I might bear without damage to the faith, gather than that Christians should be deprived of Confession. For it is the Christian's first, most necessary and useful achool, where he learns to understand and to practise God's Word and his faith, which cannot be so thoroughly done in public lectures and sermons "5

"Christians are not to be deprived of Confession." On this, and for the same reasons, Luther had already insisted in the bocklet on Confession he had published in 1529. The booklet first appeared as an appendix to an edition of his Greater Catechism published in that year, and is little more than an amended version of Rörer's notes of his Palra Sunday sermon in 1529.3

In this booklet on Confession, also entitled "A Short Exhortation to Confession,"4 he says of the "secret Confession made to a brother alone ": " Where there is something special that oppresses or troubles us, worries us and will give us no rest, or if we find ourselves halting in our faith," we should "complain of this to a brother and seek counsel, consolation and strength." "Where a heart feels its amfulness and is desirous of comfort, it has here a sure refuge where it may find and hear God's Word." "Whoever is a Christian, or wishes to become one, is hereby given the good advice to go and fetch the precious treasure." " Thus we teach now what an excellent, costly and consoling thing Confession is, and admonish all not to despise so fine a possession." As the "parehed and hunted hart " panteth after the fountains, so ought our soul to pant after "God's Word or Absolution "-The zeal expected of the penitent is well described, but here, as a so often the case with Luther, we again find the mistake resulting from his false idealism. vis. that, after doing away with all obligation properly so called, personal fervour and the faith he preached would continue to supply the needful.

VP 560 386 # P 589 - 383

Werke  Weim ed 29, p 133 f
 Ibid., ad ed., 23, p. 87 ff

Before Luther's day Confession had been extelled on higher grounds than merely on account of the comfort and instruction it afforded. It had been recognised as a true Sacrament instituted by Christ for the forgiveness of sins, and committed by Him with the words "Whose sins you shall forgive," etc. (John xx. 22 f), to the exercise of duly appointed ministers. Yet the earlier religious literature had not been behindhand in pointing out how great a boon it was for the human heart to be able to pour its troubles into the ears of a wise and kindly guide, who could impart a true absolution and pour the balm of consolation and the light of instruction into the soul kneeling humbly before him as God's own representative.

As regards the instruction, on which Luther lays such stress as the "main reason" for retaining the practice, the Catholic Confession handbooks of that period, particularly some recently re-edited, show how careful the Church was about this matter.

Frank Falk has recently made public three such handbooks, of which very few copies were hitherto known. Une of these is the work of a priest of Frankfurt a. M., Magister Johann Wolff (Lupi), and was first published in $478; the second is a block-book containing a proparation for Confession, probably printed at Nuremberg in $475; the third an Augsburg manual of Confreeion printed in 1504. The last two were intended more for popular use and give the sone in the neder of the Decalogue. The first, by Wolff, paster of St. Peter's at Frankfurt, consists of two parts, one for children, the other for "older people, learned or unformed," containing examinations of conscience, very detailed and explicit in some justs, into the arm against the Ten-Commandancess, the seven capital sens, and, anally, the size committed with "the five outward senses." The examination of conscience for children for the sake of netruction also includes the Our Father, Had Mary, Greed and Decalogue, slite the last of capital aims, Secrements and hight Bentitudes. The sopious Latin tags from Peter Lombard, Scotus, Gerson, etc., point to the manual having been meant prenarily as a guide for the clergy, on whom an appendix also impresses the advantages of a frequent explanation of the Ten Commandurate from the pulpit. Is hoolinasters too, so the manual mays, should also be arged to instruct on the Commandments those committed to their care. Luther's manual on Confession contains an many echoes of Wolff's work for of other Catholic pensiontial handbroker that one of Wolff a Protestant editors remarks . "Buch spreadent in certainly more than a mere chance consciouse." and, further. It is difficult in view of the great resemblance of thought and in places even of language, not to mailine that the younger man is indebted to his predecemen." However this may be. Wilf's work, though holding no very high place as regards other arrangement or style, esserly expresses the general trend of the Cathore teaching on morabty at that time, and refutes arrow the unfounded charge that religious pretruction for the people was entirely absent.

^{2 &}quot;Drei Beichtbuchlein nach den Zehngeboten aus der Frutzeit der Buchdruckerkunst," Münster, 1907 ("Reformstionsgesch Studien und Texto," Hft., 2).

"We see how mature and leven in many particulars was the moral sense in that much-abused period. . . . The author m not catalled with merely an outward, pharmaical rightcommun, but the source is what he everywhere moute on. ... He also defines regular money — no absolute upreplutions of spirit, thankful, devoted love of God and pure charity towards our neigh-bour, free from all ulterior motive? These words, of the "Leipargor Zertung " ("Wamenschaftliche Beslage, No. 10, 1896), regarding the Leipzig "Besensepegel" of 1495, Falk appare equally to Wolff's handbook for Confession.

This latter instruction dwells particularly on the need of " contrition, secrew and gred for an " on the part of the pendent.

2 F. W. Battenberg, * Beachtlaichlein des Mag. Weiff," Gregori, 1907, pp. 189, 205.

* Falls, 1944., p. 13. Folk also quotes (p. 14) a noteworthy observa-tion of Lutureers (* Zeitschr für christi Kunst," 9, p. 5); "The close of the 15th century was the time when the Decalogue as the startingpoint for Confession, was most frequently commentated, described and or period personally. For those unable to read, tables with the Comresession to furnity pictured hung in the churches, echools and re-I come mentioned and the bucks on this subject were abundantly i lustraced with woodcuts."

N Paulus, in several articles, has furnished superahundant proof, that in those years, which some would have us believe were addicted to the straigest externalism, the need of contation in Confession was correctly dwell upon in German religious writings.

Luther, however, even in the early days of his change, under the influence of a certain distaste and prejudice in favour of his own pet ideas, had conceived an aversion for Confession. Here again his opposition was based on purely personal, psychological grounds. The terrors he had endured in Confession owing to his curious mental constitution, his entity to all io-called holiness-by-works—leading him to undervalue the Church's ancient institution of Confession—and the steadily growing influence of his prejudices and polemics, alone explain how he descended so often to the most odious and untrue misrepresentations of Confession as practised by the Papists.

What in the depths of his heart he really desired, and what he openly called for, viz. a Confession which should heal the wounds of the soul and, by an enlightened faith, promote moral betterment—that, alas, he himself had destroyed with a violent hand.

In his letter to Frankfurt quoted above he abuses the Catholic system of Confession because it requires the admission of all mortal sins, and ealls it "a great and everlasting martyrdom," "trumped up as a good work whereby God may be placated." He calumnistes the Catholic past by declaring it did nothing but "count up sins" and that "the insufferable burden, and the impossibility of obeying the Papal law caused such fear and distress to timorous souls that they were driven to deapair." And, in order that the most odious charge may not be wanting, he concludes: "This brought in money and goods, so that it became an idol throughout the whole world, but it was no doctrine, examination or exercise leading to the confession and acknowledgment of Christ." The fables which he bolstered ^{} Die Reue in den deutschen Beichtschriften des ausgehenden MA. "im "Zeitecht für kath. Theol.," 28, 1994, pp. 1-36. "In den deutschen Erbauungsschriften des ausgehenden MA.," ibid., pp. 446-485. "In den deutschen Sterbebüchiem des ausgehenden MA.," ibid., pp. 582-598 —Cp. also, Luzian Pfleger, "Die Reue in der deutschen Diehtung des MA." ("Wiss, Beil auf Germania," 1919, Nos. 45-47).

* "Werke," Weim ed., 30, 3, pp. 566, 568 f., Eri. ed., 265, pp. 382, 385.

up on certain abuses, of which even the Papal penitentiary was guilty, were only too readily behaved by the masses.

Church Music.

In order to enliven the church services Luther greatly favoured congregational singing. Of his important and successful labours in this direction we shall merely say here, that he himself composed canticles instinct with melody and force, which were either set to music by others or sung to olden Catholic tunes, and became hugely popular among Protestants, chiefly because their wording expresses so well the feelings of the assembled congregation. One of Luther's Hymnbooks, with twenty-four hymns composed by himself, appeared in 1524.

Music, particularly religious music, he loved and cherished. yielding himself entirely to the enjoyment of its inspiring and ennobling influence. As a schoolboy he had earned his bread by singing, at the University he delighted his comrades by his playing on the lute; later he never willingly relinquished music, and took care that the hours of recreation should be gladdened by the singing of various motets. Music, he said, dispelled and thoughts and was a marvellous. cure for melancholy. In his Table-Talk he describes the moral influence of music in language truly striking.4 "My heart overflows and expands to music; it has so often refreshed and delivered me anadst the worst troubles," thus to the musician Senfi at Munich when asking him to compose a motet.4 He supplied an Introduction in the shape of a poem entitled "Dame Misse" to Johann Walther's "The Praise and Prize of the lovely art of Music " (1538). It commences. There can be no ill will here. Where all sing with voices clear-liste or envy, wrath or rage,-When sweet strains our minds engage. Being himself conversant with musical composition, he took pleasure in Walther's

More on Lather and Hypotology in vol. v., xxxiv., 4.
 See Mathemas, "Tochreden, pp. 111, 150, 359; "cyregiae cantilence post canon receivered." He hanself on one occasion sung. "octave tone, "stad. p. 3-2, ep. p. 391

4 Cp., e.g., Werke, "Erl. ed., 89, p. 307; "Collequ" ed. Bindsell, 3, p. 48 eq.

³ See vol. 1., p. 171 f. ⁴ The whole in Kostlin Kawerau, 2, p. 503, description of counterpoint and in his ingenious comparison of the sequence of melodies to a troop of boys at play.

¹ Cp. on the abuses of the Pententury and for an elucidation of certain magnifestandings, E. Göller, "Die paper, Pantentance von ihrem Urspring last. . . . Pins Y.," 2 vols., Rome, 1907-1911.

Grauert admirably groups together "Luther's poetic talent, the gift of language, which enabled him so to master German, his work for German hyronology, his enthusiastic love of music, of which he well knew the importance as a moral factor, and his familiarity with the higher forms of polyphonic composition." He also remarks quite rightly that these favourable traits had been admitted unreserved.y by Johannes Janssen."

2. Emotional Character and Intellectual Gifts

The traits mentioned above could hardly be duly appreciated unless we also took into account certain natural qualities in Luther from which his depth of feeling sprang.

A Catholic has recently called him an "emotional man," and, so far as thereby his great gifts of intellect and will are not called into question, the description may be allowed to stand.* Especially is this apparent in his peculiar humour, which cannot fail to charm by its freshness and spontaneity all who know his writings and his Table-Talk, even though his wittiesms quite clearly often served to screen his bitter vexation, or to help him to react against depression, and were frequently disfigured by obscenity and malice. It is a more grateful task to observe the deep feeling expressed in his popular treatment of religious topics. Johannes Janssen declares that he finds in him "more than once a depth of religious grasp which reminds one of the days of German mysticism,"4 while George Evers, in a work otherwise hostile to Luther, admits . "We must acknowledge that a truly Christian credulity peeps out everywhere, and, particularly in the Table-Talk, is so simple and childlike as to appeal to every heart." Evers even adds: "His religious life as pictured there gives the impression of a man of Draver."5

 $JV_* \leq S$

¹ Grauert, "Heinrich Denifie," 1906, p. 7.

[&]quot;He possessed all the gifts which go to make an emotional man, as is apparent everywhere; depth, however, and true inwardness were not his." A. M. Weus, "Lutherpsychologie," p. 223. What he says of Luther's "depth" must be read in the light of what is said in the text above.

See vol. v., xxxi., 5.
 Above, p. 244.

^{*} Evers, Martin Luther," 6, p. 701. Further details on Luther's prayers below, p. 274 ff

The circumstantial and rehable account given by Johann Cochissus of an interview which he had with Luther at Worms in 1521 gives us a certain glimpse into the latter's feelings at that critical juncture. After holding a lengthy disputation together, the pair withdrew into another room where Cochleus implored his opponent to admit his errors and to make an end of the scandal he was giving to souls. Both were so much moved that the tears came to their eyes. "I call God to witness," writes Cochleus, "that I spoke to him faithfully and with absolute conviction." He pointed out to him as a friend how willing the Pope and all his opponents were to forgive him; he was perfectly ready to admit and condemn the abuses in connection with the indulgences against which Luther had protested; his religious apostasy and the revolt of the peasants whom he was leading astray were, however, a different matter. The matter was frankly discussed between the two, partly in German, partly in Latin. Luther finally mastered the storm obviously raging within and brought the conversation. to an end by stating that it did not rest with him to undo what had been done, and that greater and more learned menthan he were behind it. On bidding him farewell, Cochleus assured him with honest regret that he would continue the literary fend; Luther, for his part, promised to answer him vigorously.1

Luther's mental endowments were great and unique.

Nature had bestowed on him such mental gifts as must astonish all, the more they study his personality. His extraordinary success was due in great part to these rare qualities, which were certainly calculated to make of him a man truly illustrious had he not abused them. His lively reason, quick grosp and ready tongue, his mind, so well stocked with ideas, and, particularly, the inexhaustible fertility of his imagination, allowing him to express himself with such ease and originality, enchanted all who came into contact with him.

Polich of Mellerstadt, one of the most highly respected Professors of the Wittenberg University, and of Luther, when as yet the latter was scarcely known. "Keep an eye on that young mork, Master Martin Lother, he has a reason to fine and keep as I have not come across in all my life; he will certainly become a man of stampers." Jones, his freed, assures us that others too, amongst them Long and Staupets, admitted they had rever known a man of such extenordinary talent." Urban Rhetius, who visited him in 1534, in the report he gives shows himself quite overpowered by Luther's mind and talent. "He is a theologian such as we excely meet. I have always thought much of Luther, but now I think of him more highly than ever. For now I have seen and heard what cannot be explained in writing to mayone not present. . . . I will tell you how I feet. It is true we all of us write occasionally and expound the Scriptures, but, tompared with Luther, we are children and reere schoolboys."

¹ The account by Cochless, taken from a special print of 1540 "of which sufficient account has hardly been made," in Endem, "Lethers Briefwechsel," 3, p. 174 ff. New addition of the "Collogians Cochles." by J. Greving, in "Flugschriften and den eisten Jahren der Reformation," 4, Hit. 3, Lequing, 1919.

He friends generally stoud in a certain swe of his greatness, shough, in their case, we can account etherwise for their admiralion. Later written ton, even amongst the Catholics, felt in the Expensing language of his writings the working of a powerful mend, much as they regretted his abuse of his pits. "His mind was both charp and active," such was the opinion of Storia Padevalue, the Jenuit, author of a famous history of the Council of Trent , The was made for learned studies and pursued them without Integue to either mind or body. His learning seemed his greatest becomes not this he was went to display its his discourse. In him felicity of expression was united with a stormy energy. Thereby he won the appears of those who trust more to appearance than to reality. His talents filled him with a self reliance which the respect shown him by the minute only interacted. " " Lather's mind was a fertile one, he writes elsewhere, but its fruits were more often sour than ripe, more often abortices of a grant than viable of spring "1. His elect and too-prolific fancy even enclangered his other gifts by putting in the shade his real intellectual endournments. "His imaginstine," Albert Wess truly says, " was, next to his will, the most strongly developed of his mase faculting, and in powerful as it was clear. Herein chiefly has the secret of his power of language. "*

To his temperamental and intellectual qualities, which indoubtedly stamped his works with the impress of a "giant," we must add his obstinate strength of will and his extraordinary tenseity of purpose.

⁴ for Jones declares in her funeral address on Lather. * Lathers Werks," ed. Welch, 21, p. 362* ff.

Ibid.
 In Uhlborn, "Urbanus Rhegius," 1861, p. 189 f.
 Itaria del Corretto di Trento." I d. Roma. 1604. Il p. 58. Hero ve read. "Non cascido povere di letteratura, ne pareva ricchimino, pocche pertava tutto il nio capitale nella purita de la langua."

^{* 6, 10 (...} p. 691); Denific ("Luther and Luthertum," 18, p. 24) calls (ather "not merely takented but in many points very reach to ? Ibid p way be enumerated buther a good natural quanties, which he is ready to prize.

4 "Lutherpsychologie," p. 225.

Were it possible to separate his will from his aims and means, and to appreciate it apart, then one could scarcely rate it high enough. Thousands, even of the bravest, would have quailed before the difficulties he had to face both without and within his camp. The secret of his success lay simply in his ability to rise superior to every difficulty. thanks to his defiance and power of will. Humanly it is hard to understand how all attacks and defeats only served to embolden him. Protestants have spoken of the "demonuscal greatness" manifest in Luther, have called him a man of "huge proportions and power" in whose "breast two worlds wrestied," and, on account of his "herote character," have even claimed that history should overlook " the vices proper to heroes."

1.

Among Catholic writers the earlier Döllinger, for all his aversion for Luther's purpose and the weapons he employed, nevertheless says of him: "If such a one is justly to be styled a great man, who, thanks to his mighty gifts and powers, accomplishes great things and brings millions of minds under his sway—then the son of the peasant of Mohra must be reckoned among the great, yea, among the greatest of men." Upon the disputed definition of "greatness" we cannot enter here. (See vol. vi., xl., 1.) Yet, in view of the intellectual gifts lavished on Luther, Dollinger's words are undoubtedly not far away from the mark, particularly when we consider his gigantic estucity for work and the amazing extent of his literary labours, distracted though he was by other cares.

We have already had occasion to give the long list of the works he penned in 1529 and 1530, and we may add some further examples. In 1521, in which year he lost over five weeks in travelling, not to speak of the correspondence and other business which claimed his attention in that exciting period of his life, he still found time to write more than twenty works of varying length which in the Weimar edition cover 985 large octavo pages; he also translated a book by Melanchtbon into German, commenced his translation of the libble and his church Postals. In 1528 he produced no less than twenty-four books and pamphlets, and, besides this, his lectures on Deuteronomy (247 pages in the Weimar edition) and a German translation of the whole Pentateuch. He also preached about 150 sermons, planned other works and wrote the usual flood of letters, of which only a few, viz. 112, have been preserved, amongst them being some practically treatises in themselves and which duly appeared in print. Even in 1545, when already quite broken down in health and when two months were spent in travelling, he managed with a last effort, inspired by his deadly hate, to compose even so considerable a book as his "Wider das Bapstum zu Rom vom Teuffel gestifft," as wellas other smaller writings and the usual number of private letters, circulars, and memoranda."1 At the very end he told his friend, the preacher Jacob Probst, that he meant to work without intermission though old and weary, with a failing eyesight and a body racked with pain.

Sceberg, "Luther und Luthertum in der neuesten kath. Beleuchtring " (a reply to Deniffe). 1904

" Luther, cine Sk zie, ' p. 51; " KL.  8, col. 339,

Vol. ii., p. 298 f.; and vol. ii., p. 160,

These labours, of which the simple enumeration of his books gives us an inkling, even the most fertile mind could have performed only by utilising every moment of his time and by renouncing all the allurements to distraction and repose. The early hours of the morning found Luther regularly in his study, and, in the evening, after his conversation with his friends, he was wont to betake himself early to bed so as to be able to enjoy that good sleep, without which, he declared, he could not meet the demands made upon him.

That, however, behind all his fiery zeal for work, certain moral influences not of the highest also had a share is obvious from what has been said previously.

3. Intercourse with Friends. The Interior of the former Augustinian Monastery

Hitherto we have been considering the favourable traits in Luther's character as a public man; turning to his quieter life at Wittenberg, we shall find no lack of similar evidences. We must begin by asking impartially whether

¹ Cp. H. Böhrner, "Luther im Lichte der neueren Forschung," 1 D 115

There a no sufficient ground for charging the earlier Catholic accounts of Luther with having mid nothing of his better side. It is true that in one defence, and following the usual method of controversy, they did must rather too much on what was objectionable—the Jesuita of the 18th and .7th centures being no exception to the rule—without the notorious Table-Talk does not reveal a better side of his character.

The question must be answered in the affirmative by every unprejudiced reader of those notes. Lather's gifts of mind and temperament, his veriation, liveliness of imagination, easy use of Scripture and insight even into worldly matters; further his mre talent of simple narration, and not seldom the very subjects he chooses give a real worth to Luther's Table Talk, notwithstanding all that may be urged against it. It is accordingly the historian's duty faithfully to portray its better side.

The more favourable side of the Table-Talk.

Any comprehensive judgment on the Table-Talk as a whole is out of the question; with its changing forms and colours and its treatment of the subjects it is altogether too sufficiently discorring includes what was true and what was false (H. Duhr a.z., "Gesch, der Jesinten in den Landern deutscher Zunge." 1907 p. 641) - Littlier himself was however partly to harne for that, owing to the numerity of infercurable material he provided. But, acter the first heat of hattle was over even in the days of Caspar Lienberg, the Categoo parish pricat, who, in 1889, wrete a biography of Luther, there have always been numbers of Catholic writers ready to minut the good there was in Little? At the present day approxistive passages attented both to general encycloperion and in hardbooks written for students. To west in some examples H. Bruck (. Lebrts, der. KG.) speaks of Lather's hopers ing magnation, his popular exequence, which was its consequence, and of on indefetignible capacity for world, also of his distiturestedness. If Along save ("Universalgesch der christl. Kurche"). He did not ack the Jeeper religieum fes leig which accim its satisfaction ". J. A. Mohler (" Kil.") writes. " He may be compared for he power to the great conquerors. of the world; like them, too, he knew no other law than he own will." If w Dollanger (an yet still a Catholic mays of him ("RL" 5), that he was a "sympathetic friend, free from avaries and greed of money" and ever mady in anost others." "The posterior of undensities great richard ladest in districts and a witherful 2 it of carrying near away. In Herier's "Nonversa somicularity," 5' 4 9m; we trad of Lather: "In the circle of his fraends . . . he knew how to speak thoughtfully of matters of theology His family life had its finer ando . . . he was a stautich advocate of conjugal fidelity in his sermons and elsewhere, . . . What he taught concerning the dignity of workly earlings was in many instances quite right and true. . . . In the works he intended for each a on he gave his followers at mulating food for thought arms from the treasure boose of the tradia of Christianty and of nature, , , . He promoted a more diagent study of Hoy perapture and the came of postive theology to your effect. His act of using his native tempus was of great service in furthering the impusge. His translation of the while Bible stands on a augustic monument to him, . . . The powerful hymne he composed are also trensured by the whole Protestant world."

BETTER SIDE OF TABLE-TALK 268

kalcidoscopic. Again, in conjunction with what is good and attractive, frivolous, nay, even offensive and objectionable subjects are dealt with, for which the reader is in no wise prepared.³

It is necessary to emphasise the fact—which may be new to some—that to regard the Table-Talk as a hoteh-potch of foul sayings is to do it an injustice. Catholics, as a matter of course, are used to finding in anti-Lutheran polemics plentiful quotations from it not at all to Luther's credit; of its better contents, a knowledge of which is of even greater importance in forming an opinion of his character, no lint is contained in this sort of literature. Some are even ignorant that Protestant writers have more than compensated for this undue stress on the unfavourable ade of the Table-Talk by the attractive selection they give from its finer parts.

In point of fact the subject of Luther's conversations is, not infrequently, the attributes of God; for instance, His mercy and love; the duties of the faithful towards God and their moral obligations in whatever state of life they be placed; hints to the clergy on the best way to preach or to instruct the young; not to speak of other observations regarding neighbourly charity, the vices of the age and the virtues or faults of great personages of that day, or of the past. Luther was fond of discoursing on subjects which, in his opinion, would prove profitable to those present, though often his object was merely to enliven and amuse the company.

The tone and the choice of his more serious discourses frequently show us that he was not unmindful of the fact, that his words would be heard by others beyond the narrow circle of his private guests; he was aware that what he said was noted down, and not unfrequently requested the reporters to commit this or that to writing, knowing very well that such notes would circulate. At times, however, he seemed to become forgetful of this, and allowed observations to escape him which caused many of his oldest admirers to regret the publication of the Table-Talk. A large number of statements made by him on the spur of the moment must, moreover, not be taken too seriously, for they are either in contradiction with other utterances or are practically explained away elsewhere.

See vol 11., p. 223.

For the collections of the Table-Talk see vol. 11, p. 218 ff.

Thus, for instance, in a convention in the winter of 1542-1543, occur the following words which really do him honour. " God has preserved the Church by means of the schools ; they it is that keep the Church stending. Schools are not very imposing no to their exterior, yet they are of the greatest use. It was to the schools that the little boys owed their knowledge of the Paternoster and the Creed, and the Church has been wonderfully preserved by means of the small schools." - Yet at an earlier date, he had said just the contrary viz. that before his day the young had been allowed to drift to wreck and run, owing to entire lack of systemation.

On cortain religious subjects he rould speak with deep feeling * Compare, for instance, what he mays of Clicut's intercourse with His disciples.

In what a friendly way," Luther remarks, "did He behave towards His disciples ! How charming were all His dealings with them ! I quite believe what is related of Peter, viz. that, after Christ's Ascennion, he was always meeting and wiping his eyes with a handkerchief till they grew quito red, when neked the cause of his gnes, he replied, he could not help shedding tears when he reneralizzed the friendly intercourse they had had with Christ the Lord. Unnet indeed treats us just as He did His disciples, if only we would but believe it, but our eyes are not open to the fact. It was a real wonder how they [the Apostles] were so altered in mind at Pentecost. Ah, the disciples must have been fine fellows to have been witnesses of auch things and to have had such fellowship with Christ the Lord ! "1

Immediately after this, however, we hear him inveighing against the Pope with statements incredibly false, whilet, just before, in another conveniation, he had introduced his favourite error concerning Justification by Faith *

It may suffice to keep to the dezen pages or so from which the above kindler samples were extracted, to become acquainted with the wealth of good interspersed amongst so much that is worthless, and at the same time to appreciate how lively his mind and has powers of observation still remained even when increasing years and personent had health were becoming a burden to him.

As to the way in which his then savings were harded down, we may state, that, in the waster of 1542-1543, Cospar Heydenreich.

Mathesias, "Tischreden," p. 311
Cp. the emotion which accompanied another fine atterance spoken "ex pieno et accesso corde" (Corratus, "Tageback," p. 23), There Lather was apeacing of the profundity of the Word of God and of reliance on His Promises. See also below, p. 265.
Bathesias, "Tischreden," p. 319.
Hod., p. 311, with the brating. "Prince terranges."
Hod., p. 310.
Hod., pp. 310-322

BETTER SIDE OF TABLE-TALK 265

who had already officiated as paster of Josehanntal, was present at Lather's table and wrote down those and other remarks as they dropped from the specime tips; they were afterwords incorporated in Matheman' collection. In the original they tre partly in Latin, partly in Gurman, and betray not the slightest attempt at point. The reason that we thus find Latin passages in reports of German environments in that the reporter, in order to take down more rapedly what he heard, at times made time of the rabbe Table had recourse to the same device. The consequence is, that, in the recent German editions of the Table-Talls, we find in one and the imme convursation some sentences in the Old German Listher actually used, and others in present day German, the inter being merely translations from the Latin.

After discouring at length on the fact that schools right to be carefully ensembed for the soles of the suming generation of Church tenchers, he mays. "The work of the schools is not brilliant in the oyes of the world, but it is of the greatest utility." (No. 608., then follows the praise of the old actions already recorded)—" Wenith in the most insignificant thing in the world, the measure pit in God a power to bestow on man. What is it compared with the Werd of God? Indeed, what is it compared with boddy endowments, or with beauty, or with the gifts of the soul? and yet people fret as much for it. Meterial formal, effected and final course here fore hadly. For this reason the Alreighty annaly gives riches to rude donkeys upon whom He bustows nothing class." (611).

Luther related incidentally that his father Rans, who died at Mansfeed in 1540, when asked on his death-fied whether he believed in the Apostini Creed, replied. "He would indeed be a secondard who refused to believe that." "That, 'ordly remarked Luther 'is a wave from the risk world.'; whereupon Melanch-then shamed in a "Happy those who die in the knowledge of Christ as did your [daughter] Magisless († Rep. 20, 1542), the older we grow the more looksh we become. When we grow up we begin to dispute and want to be wise, and yet we are the biggest fools " [$15).

According to Lather, God's most gravess wrath then rested on the Jews. They are blinded, peny farmically and yet are not heard. "Oh, dear God, rather than remain estent in Thou puents us with postdenes, the French discuss and whatever other dreasted maladam the acidiors curse. Cod anyer I have stretched out My hands, come, give our, draw righ to Me ! [The Jews reply We won't. "God anye! You have leans; hear him. [They arream]: Inh, we will full him! [Cod anye]: here in My Son! [They reply]: Out on Him! Hence (fur Lord God now treats them as we see. That is how abandoned children fare, who retain to obey their parents and are therefore deserted by them. No one has ever written concerning the weath of God, nor is anyone able to do so; no elequence can plumb the depine of this wrath. O Henvenly Father—{this be easily with classed.

hande] -allow us to empty the sanchine and permit us not to fall away from the Word! Just fancy, for filters hundred years the Jews have grouned under him Wrath! And what will be the ond of it all? Aids, there will be a dreadful arene in hell!! (6:10).

Agustat the Jews he was very bitter. It was reinted at table, that, in agite of the two books Luther had recently published, the Hebrews stood in favour with the Counts of Manifeld, and, from their synagogus, had even dared to hurl at an Euleben prescher the opprobrious spethet of Goim. Luther replied that if he were pastor and Court Chaplesa there bles Colous, or even a sample prencher, he would at once rusign has post. When it was remarked that the Jews knew how to carry layour with the great, his commer t was: "The devil can do much." On being netted whether it would be right to how the ears of a Jew who intered a biaspheny, he replied, "Certainly . I for one would mack himon the jaw. Were I able, I would knack him down and stab him in my angur. If it is lawful, according to both the human and the Diving her, to full a robber, then it is marely even more permanile to slay a blasphenser." To the observation of one of his guesta that the Jews breated, that, of the two, the Christians were the worse sources, Lether said: "That is quite true. At Leipzigk there are greater universitian the Jows. But a distinction must be drawn. Among the Jews usury is made the rule, whereas amongst the Crist and it is represent. "We preach against it and are heartily opposed to sty with them this is not the ease."

In a neuter street, in the doors pages under consideration, he louched an grany other instructive subjects, whether connected with questions of the day or with religion, or the Bible. He portrays with a clear hand the dominant idea of the Book of Job, in comparison with which all the dramatic force of the Greek plays was as nothing ($16), he expounds the narratives of Christ's Prayer is the Garden of Ouves, where He suffered independently being for our sine (626), in greater to a query he speaks of the anotating of Our Lord's feet by Magdalone, and observes, referring to the consure drawn from Judas by his avarice. "That is the way of the world and the devil, what should be bluned in pressed, and what should be pressed in biamed " (62"). What he says of the wast number of the sissing alluded to an frequently in the Old Testament, was probably also colled firth by eithe questioner (412). Anidst this recur new invectives against the Jews and their magic , never ought we to wat or drack with them (619), give against the Turks and their bigotry and unbelief. the latter remarked the fanatics in that, like them, they refused to doubt their revelations — this he proved by certain sustances (623). He speaks of the strong forth of m uple t bristians with feeling and not without ency (614). Ho extols the power of prayer for others, and proves it not recely from Bible at texts and exemples, but also from his own superrace ; " we, too, prayed Philip back to life. Verily prayer can do much ... God does not reward it with a certain, fixed measure, but with a measure pressed and running over, as He says. . . . A powerful thing is prayer, if only I could believe it, for God has bound and pledged Hamself by st " (617).

Dealing with astrology, he demonstrates its folly by a lengthy and very striking argument; when it was objected that the reformation he was carrying out had also been predicted by the stars at the time of his birth, he replied: "Oh no, that is another matter? That is purely the work of God. You will never persuade me otherwise!" (625).

As to practical questions, he speaks of the doings of the Biectoral marriage courts in certain cases (621), of severity is the up-bringing of children (624); of the choice of godparents for Baptism (620), of the authority of guardians in the marriage of their wards (613); and of what was required of these who dispensed the Supper (618).

On one occasion, when the conversion of the Jaws at the end of the world was being discussed, the "Doctoress" (Catherine) intervened in the conversation with a Biblical quotation, but her contribution (John π , 16) was rejected in a friendly way by Luther as mistaken.

In these pages of the Table-Talk unseemly speeches or expressions such as call for censure eisewhere do not occur, though the Pope and the Papacy are repeatedly made the butt of misrepresentation and abuse (610, 616, 619), as was only to be expected, we find here again Luther's favourite assertion that the Roman doctrine of works is a gross error very harmful to souls (628); in support of his opinion Luther gives a long string of Bible texts.

Apart from the abuse just referred to and some other details these few leaves, taken at haphazard from the Table-Talk, are certainly not discreditable to Luther. Beside these might moreover be placed, as we have already admitted elsewhere, many other pages the contents of which are equally unexceptionable.

It is naturally not the task or duty of Catholic controversialists to fill their works with statements from the Table-Talk such as the above; they would nevertheless do well always to bear in mind that many such favourable utterances occur in Luther's works with which moreover the Protestants are as a rule perfectly familiar. The latter, indeed, who often are acquainted only with these better excerpts from Luther's books, sermons, letters or Table-Talk, are not unnaturally disposed to view with suspicion those writers who bestow undue prominence on unfavourable portions of his works, torn from their context.

Unless Catholic poleraies contrive to look at things from their opponents' point of view, their success must always be limited; short of this they run the risk of being accused of being ignorant of what tells in Luther's favour, or of not giving it due weight. All controversy should in reality be conducted in a friendly spirit, and, in the discussion of Luther, such a spirit joined with a broad-minded appreciation of what is good in the opposite party cannot fail to be productive of happy results. How far Protestants have acted in this spirit is, also, plain to all who have had dealings with them. There can be no question but that certain excesses perpetrated on the opposite side go far to explain, if not to excuse, the methods adopted by some of the champions of Catholicism.

Kindher Traits Evinced by Luther.

The great veneration felt for Luther by most of his pupils, particularly by those who were intimate with him, enables us to see the impression his talents made on others. It is, of course, probable that their mental submission to him was in part due to the feeling, that it was an exceptional honour to be accounted friends of a man famous throughout the world and so distinguished by his extraordinary success , yet it is equally certain that it was his own peculiar charm which caused not merely young students, such as those who noted down the Table-Talk, but even mature and experienced men, to look up to him with respect and affection and voluntarily to subject themselves to his mind and his will. The fact is, in Luther a powerful and domineering talent existed side by side with great familiarity in consorting with others and a natural gift of making himself loved. The unshakable confidence in God on which he and his followers seemed to lean in every reverse they met, perhaps impressed people more than anything else.

[&]quot;His expectness," wrote a devoted young follower of his, " is so tempered with gladness and friendliness that one longs to live with him; it seems so though God wished to demonstrate how blusful and joyous his Evangel is, not merely by his teaching, but even by his conduct." Thus the Swim student, Johann Kessler, who became acquainted with Luther after his return from the Wartburg." Another voice from the same period enthusiastically

² In his "Sabbata," ed. Götzinger in the St. Gallen "Mitterlungen zur vateriänd. Gesch. 1868; new edition, St. Gallen, 1802, p. 78 ff.

Extols his friendly ways and his winning speech in his dealings with his pupils, and the power of his words. "which cost such a spall over the hearts of his hearts that as your, who is not made of stone, having once heard him, yearns to hear him again." Thus his desciple Albert Burrer."

Motheress, one of his baser pupils declares. "The mea wesfull of grace and the Hely Chost. Hence all who sought counsel from him as a prophet of God, found what they desired. * Often, he remarks, difficult questions from beripture were submitted to him (in conversation at table) which he answered both possily and concastly. And if anyone contradeted him he took to offense but skilfally put he gamesyer in the wrong. The Doctor has we will how to bring in his stories and enjoying and apply them as the proper juncture that it was a real pleasure and comfort to listen to him. "Amongst his other great virtum he was very easily contested, and also extremely fund."

Spangenberg, Aurilaber, Cordatus and other pupils were, so to specie, quite under his spell. Hieronymus Weller, whom Luther frequently mught to encourage in his fits of depression, remarked indeed on one occasion that the difference in age, and his reverence for Luther, prevented him from speaking and chatting as confidentially as he would have hised with the greatman? On the other hand, the Humanist, Peter Moudlanus, who was at one time rauch attached to him and never altograted with others he is poute and friendly life and in his intercourse with others he is poute and friendly; there is nothing storal or proud about him, he is affable to everyone. In company he converses cheerfully and pleasantly, is keely and gay, aways looks marry, chaorful and amashle however hard pressed by his opponents, so that one may well believe he does not not in each weighty matters without God's assistance."

Melanchthon, particularly in his early days, as our resident already know, expressed great reverance and devotion for Lather. "You know," he wrote to Spaletin during his friend a stay at the Wartburg. "how carefully we must guard this earther vessel which centerns so great a treasure. The earth holds arthrog more divises their limit." After Luther's death, in spite of the previous missinglecitandings, he said of him as a paregyric midressed to the students: "Also, the chariot of limits and the horseman thereof, who raied the Church in these latter years of her existence, has departed."

Lather was often to prove that the strong impression made by his personality was alone able to gain the day in

* Burrer's letter, in Baum, "Capito," 1960, p. 83.

* "Histonen," p. 147. Cp. ibid., pp. 142, 143.

* fönd., p. 153'. * Köstirs-Kawerau, 3, p. 510.
* In F. S. Koil, "Luthers Lebensumstände," 1, 1764, p. 2. Cp. Restin-Kawerau, 1, p. 243 f.

Köstlm-Kawerau, I, p. 442. Cp. above, vol. in., p. 323.
 Vita Lutheri," in "Vita quattur referensiorum," p. 14.

cases of difficulty, to break down opposition and to ensure the successful carrying out of hardy plans. Seldom indeed did those about him offer any objection, for he possessed that gift, so frequently observed in men of strong character, of exercising, in every matter great or small, a kind of suggestive influence over those who approached him. He possessed an inner, unseen power which seemed to triumph over all, . . . even over the claims of truthfulness and logie; besides this, he was gifted with an imposing presence and an uncanny glance. He was by no means curt in his answers, but spoke freely to everyone in a manner calculated to awaken the confidence and unlock the hearts of his hearers. Of his talkativeness he himself once said: "I don't believe the Emperor [Charles V] says so much in a year. as I do in a day."3

His "disinterestedness which led him to care but little about money and worldly goods "a increased the respect felt for him and his work. So little did he care about heaping up riches, that, when scolding the Wittenbergers on account of their avarice, he could say that "though poor, he found more pleasure in what was given him for his needs than the rich and opulent amongst them did in their own possessions."4 So entirely was he absorbed in his public controversy that he paid too little attention to his own requirements, particularly in his bachelor days; he even relates how, before he took a wife, he had for a whole year not made his bed, or had it made for him, so that his awent caused it to rot. "I was so weary, overworked all the day. that I threw myself on the bed and knew nothing about it." He was never used to excessive comfort or to indulgence in the finer pleasures of the table. In every respect, in conversation and intercourse with others and in domestic life, he was a lover of simplicity. In this he was ever anxious to set a good example to his fellow-workers.

Although he frequently accepted with gratitude presents

In a sermon of 1528, "Werke," Werm, ed., 27, p. 408 f.
 Kost in Kawerau, 2, p. 516.

¹ See our remarks above, p. 112 ff , on the way he came to believe in the truth of the falsehoods he so often repeated and even to convince has pupils of it too.

Köstlin hawerau, 2, p. 283.

Jos. Hundhausen, "Kirche oder Protestantismus," a Catholic work, Mayence, 1883, p. 225 from the great, yet on occasion he was not above cautioning givers of the danger such gifts involved, when the "eyes of the whole world are upon us."1 In 1542, when there was a prospect of his receiving from his friend Amsdorf, the new " bishop " of Naumburg, presents out of the estates of the bishopric, he twice wrote to him to refrain from sending him. anything even a single hare, because " our courtly centaurs. [the selfish and rapacious nobles] must be given no pretext for venting their glowing hate against us on the trumped-up charge that we were desirous of securing gain through you." "They have gulped down everything without compunction, but still would blame us were we to accept a naitry gift of game. Let them feed in God's or another's [the devil's] name, so long as we are not accused of greed." Dollinger speaks of Luther as "a sympathetic friend, devoid of avarice and greed of money, and a willing helper of others."2

He was always ready to assist the poor with open-handed and kindly liberality, and his friends especially, when in trouble or distress, could reckon on his charity.

When his own means were insufficient he sought by word of mouth or by letter to enlist the sympathy of others, of friends in the town, or even of the Elector himself, in the cause of the indigent. On more than one occasion his good nature was unfairly taken advantage of. This, however, did not prevent his pleading for the poor who flocked to Wittenberg from all quarters and were wont to address themselves to him. Thus, for instance, in 1589 we have a note in which he appealed to certain "dear gentlemen" to save a "pious and scholarly youth" from the "pangs of hunger" by furnishing him with 80 Gulden; he himself was no longer able to afford the gifts he had daily to bestow, though he would be willing, in case of accessity, to contribute half the sum."

Many of the feeble and oppressed experienced his help in the law. He reminds the lawyers how hard it is for the poor to comply with the legal formalities necessary for their protection. On one occasion, when it was a question of the defence of a poor woman, he says: "You know Dr. Martin is not only a theologian and the champion of the

¹ See vol. n., p. 133.

^{*} To Amadorf, Fob. 6 and 12, 1042, "Briefe," 5, pp. 432, 434.

¹ "Luther, one Skraze," p. 51; "KL," 8¹, col. 339.

Köstler-Kawerau, 3, p. 495

faith, but also an advocate of the poor, who troop to him from every place and corner and demand his aid and his interession with the authorities, so that he would have enough to do even if no other burden rested on his shoulders.

But Dr. Martin loves to serve the poor."1

In 1527, when the plague reached Wittenberg, he stayed on in the town with Bugenhagen in order at least to comfort the people by his presence. The University was transferred for the time being to Jena (and then to Schlieben) and the Elector accordingly urged him to migrate to Jena with his wife and family. Luther however insisted on remaining, above all on account of the urgent need of setting an example to his preachers, who were too much preoccupied with the safety of their own families. It was then that he wrote the tract "Ob man fur dem Sterben flieben muge " (Whether one may flee from death), answering the question in the negative so far as the ministers were concerned. In such dire trouble the flock were more than ever in need of spiritual help; the preachers were to exhort the people to learn diagently from the Word of God how to live and how to die, also, by Confession, reception of the Supper, reconeiliation with their neighbours, etc., to "prepare themselves in advance should the Lord knock speedily "8. He displayed the same courage during the epidemic of the so-called "English sweat," a fever which, in 1529, broke out at Wittenberg, and in other German towns, and carried off many victims. Again in 1588 and in 1589 he braved new outbreaks of the plague at Wittenberg. His wish was, that, in such cases, one or two preachers should be specially appointed to look after those stricken with the maindy. " Should the lot fall on me," he says in 1542, " I should not be afraid. I have now been through three pestilences and mixed with some who suffered from it . . . and am none the worse." "God usually protects the ministers of His

* To Anton Unrule, Judge at Torgan, June 13, 1838, "Werke," Erl. ed , 55, p. 205 | Briefwechsel, 11 p. 371).

" Mathenius, "Tuchreden," p. 285.

^{* &#}x27;Worke' Weiro ed 23, p. 323 ff; Erl. ed, 317 ff; N. Paulus (Hut.-pol. Bl., 133, 1904, p. 201) also points out the 'Courage which Luther showed in the time of the plague." also his "hiberality, his cheerful, accusise ways, how easily he was contented and how urclessly he laboured," George Evers ("Martin Luther," 6, p. 6) recognises, amongst many other good qualities, the courage he showed during the progres

Word," he writes in 1588, " if one does not run in and out of the inns and be in the beds; confessions there is no need to hear, for we bring the Word of Life." The fact that he could hoast of having braved the plague and remained at his post naturally tended to increase his influence with his congregation."

He had passed through a severe mental struggle previous to the epidemic of 1529. Only by dint of despairing efforts was he able to overcome his terrors of conscience concerning his doctrine and his own personal salvation. This inner combat so hardened him that he was fearless where others were terrified and fied. Of his own qualms of conscience he wrote to a friend in April, 1529: If it be an apostolic gift to fight with devils and to lie frequently at the point of death, then he was indeed in this a very Peter or Paul, however much he might lack the other apostolic characters. Here we have the idea of his Divine calling, always most to the front in times of danger, which both strengthens him and enables him to inspire others with a little of his own confidence. "I and Bugenhagen alone remain here." he wrote during the days of the plague, "but we are not alone, for Christ is with us and will triumph in us and shelter us from Satan, as we hope and trust."4

We already are acquainted with some of his admissions of his own weakness and acknowledgments of the greater gifts and achievements of others—confessions which have been extelled as a proof of his real humility.

"I have no such foolsh hum lity," so he says, "as to wish to deny the gifts God has bestowed on me. In myself I have indeed enough and more than enough to humble me and teach see that I am nothing. In God, however, we may well pride ourselves, and rejoice and glory in His gifts and extol them, as I myself do on account of my German Pasiter; for I studied the Pasiter, thanks be to God, with great fruit, but all to the honour and glory of God to Whom be praise for ever and ever." This he wrote to Eobanus Hessus, the poet, in a high-flown letter thanking him for translating the German Pasiter into excellent Latin."

IV. -T

Lauterback, "Tagobuch," p. 188.

Colloq.," ed. Bindseil, 1, p. 31.
 To Justus Jones, April 19, 1520, "Briefweelseel," 7, p. 87.

^{*} To Nicholas Hausmann, Aug. 20, 1827, "Briefwechsel," 6, p. 77.

Aug. 1, 1537, "Briefwechsel," 11, p. 264.

274 LUTHER THE REFORMER

Of his own virtues or sinfulness he preferred to speak humorously, as his manner was. Thus, he says, for instance, in 1526, in his suppressed "Widder den Radschlag der Meintzischen Pfafferey," that "he had not deflied any man's wife or child," "had not rebbed anyone of his goods . . . nor murdered or assaulted anyone or given help or counsel thereto"; his sin consisted in "not pulling a long face but in insisting on heing merry"; also in eating meat on forbidden days. People might defame his life, but he was not going to heed "the dirty hoganouts."

His statements belittling his own powers and achievements, coming from a man whose apparently overmastering self-confidence had, from the beginning, prepossessed so many of his followers in his favour, afford a subject for psychological study. He seems the more ready to give full play to his confidence the more he feels his weakness face to face with the menace of danger, and the more he experiences in the depths of his soul the raging of doubts which he attributes to the devil.

In the humble admissions he makes he never conceals how much he stands in need of assistance. He does not hide from himself the fact that he dreads outward troubles, and is deficient in strong and exalted virtue. But side by side with his faults, he is fend of gazing on and extelling God's gifts in his person. His peculiar form of humility, his prayer and his trust in God find expression in certain utterances and experiences, on which no judgment can be passed until we have before us a larger selection of them, particularly of such as seem to be less premeditated.

Prayer and Confidence in God.

Luther's strangely undaunted confidence and the personal nature of his reliance on God's help form part of his mental physiognomy.

^{1 '} Werke, ⁵ Erl. ed., 65, p. 26. It may be remerked incidentally that possibly Luther was not aware, that, not long before, the people of Wittenberg, though no longer Cutholie, had been shocked at his eating meat on fast days. In 1023 the people, who still kept the old custom of the Church, as a traveller remarks, were disposed to regard the overflow of the Elbe as Heaven's judgment on Luther's and his preachers laxify in the matter. See the account of Bishop Dantiscus, of Limeland, who visited Wittenberg in that year, in Hipler, ¹ Kopernikus and Luther, ² Braunsberg, 1868, p. 72; ³ I heard from the country people on my way much abuse and many executions of Luther and his co-religiousts, ³ etc.

He see around him much distress and corruption and excisions:

"Also, we are living outwardly under the origins of the devil, hence we can nother me nor hear anything good from without." And yet, he proceeds its his usual forced tens, "inwardly we are living in the language of Christ, where we behold Good a gory and His grare! For of Christ it is said: "Rule Thou in the midst of Thirm commiss." "Hatred is our reward in this world! "Our reward is an excisive remadering the magnificance of the service we reader Christ. But what is the world, its anger, or its prince? A misons that variables, a bubble that bursts, such is everything that is opposed to the Lord Whom we serve and Who works in m." With these words, no expressive of his determination, he directs his trusted pupil, Conrad Contatus, to enter courageously upon the offs o of preacher at Stendal in the March."

Again and again he wells to reasonate his faith and confidence by calling to mind not merely God a faithfulness to his promises, but also his own personal. "sufferings" and "temptations," the only escape from which, as he believed, lay is the most obstracte and presumptions belief in his cause, and in the conviction that God was constantly intervening in his favour.

"Not only from Holy Sernstare," he mad in a conversation in 1540, " but also from my violent inner combats and temptations have I learns that Chrost is God incarnate, and that there is a I now know it even better from expenses than by faith that these articles are true. For in our greatest temptations nothing can help us but the assurance that Christ became man and is now our intercessor at the right hand of the Father. There is nothing that excites our confidence to each a degree. . . . God, too, has championed this article from the beginning of the world against coun less heretics and even to-day defends it against Turk and Pops. He increasably confirms it by miracles and permits un to sail His Non, the lion of Leed and true God, and grants all that we sek in Christ's name. For what else has saved us even till the present day in no many pards but prayer to Christ * Whoever says it is Moster Philips and my doing, lies. It is God Who does it for Christ's nake. . . . Threefore we hold fast to these articles in spite of the objections of reason. They have remained and will continue."3

Luther often had recourse to prayer, especially when he found himself in difficulty, or in an awkward situation from which he could see no escape; in his letters he also as a rule asks for proyers for himself and for the common cause of the new Evangel. It is impossible to take such requests as a mere formality; his way of making them is usually so full of feeling that they must have been meant in carnest.

ir 1584 he wrote a special instruction for the simple and Mathenia, Tischreiden, p. 94.

Letter of Dec. 3, 1544, "Briefe," p. 702,

He argue people to pray fervently against." the alcietry of the Turk, of the Pope, of all false teachers and developments "; he mico moche at the prayers of the "pareons and mocks," i unable to refrain from his better polerace even in an otherwise eddying work. Yet the budy of the booklet teaches quite accurately, in a fushion recalling the directions given by 84, Ignation, how the Clur Father and other daily prayers may be devously recited, with pages after the various printions or words, so as to form a sort of meditation. He haters, so he assure his readers, was in the halat of " sucking " in this way at the Paternoster and was also fend of occupying himself with a miniar prayerful analysis of the Prolive.

His regular daily prayer he says chowhere was the Our Pather, the Creed and the other usual formulas." "I have daily to do Violence to myself in order to pray, "he remarked to his friends, "and I am asterled to repeat when I go to hed the Ten Cornmandments, the Gur Father and then a verse or two. thinking over them I fall asleep "4 " The thur Father as my prayer, I pray this and cornetimos intermingle with it comething from the Postria, so us to put to shares the vain profess and false teachers."

It must not be overhooked, however, that on extraorginary pressions, when his hetred of the Papery was more than usually strong or when troubtes present, his prayer was spt to assume strungs forms. His absnunation for the Pope found went, as he repeatedly tells us, in his malichetory Paternoster ! When in great fear and anniety concerning Melanchthon, who lay nek at Wermar, he, to use his even quaint phraseology, "threw down his been before our fled," to except Han, as it were, to reader assistance. Another such attempt to do violence to God in the purport of a prayer attered in dejection during his stay in the fortress of Cobung, which Yest Dietrich, who overheard it, given us in what he states were Luther s own words : " I know that Thou art Our God and Father, hence I am certain Thus will put to shame all those who persecute Thy children. Shouldst. Diou not do so, there will be as much danger for Thee as for us. This is Thy cause, and we only took it up because we know Thou wouldn't defend it," etc. . This intuines fromt of Lather a also

 * Einfeltige Wesse au betwe." "Works," Erl. ed., 22, p. 216 ff
 * Pp. 217, 221 f. The broklet was dedicated to Master Peter. Balbier. This meater, after having stabled in anger a feet soldier was are tenord to death. Entirer a reterrorise procured the somewhaten all the austream into one of his interest.

* "Wester" birk ed., $0. p. b. " surbrades." The whole section in question, "Trachrecian vom Gebete," really belongs here.

tells us, that, in those enzious days, Luther's conversations concerning God and his hopes for the future hore an even deeper stamp than usual of ancesty and depth of feeling. District was one of Luther's most passionately devoted pupils.

"Ah, prayer can do much," such are Luther's words in one of the mimerous passages of the Table-Talk, where he recommends its use. "By prayer many are saved, even now, just so we ourselves prayed Philip back to life."1

" It is impossible," he says, " that God should not snawer the prayer of faith, that He does not always do so as another matter. God does not give according to a prescribed measure, but heaped up and shaken down, as Ho says. . . . Hence James says (v. 16): ' Pray one for another,' etc. 'The continual prayer of a just man availeth much. That is one of the best verses in his Epistle. Prayer is a powerful thing. '8

Anyone who has followed Luther's development and understands his character will know where to find the key to these remarkable, and at first sight puzzling, declarations of trust in God and zeal in prayer.

When once the herald of the new religion had contrived to persuade himself of his Divine call, such blindly confident prayer and trust in God no longer involve anything wonderful. His utterances, undoubtedly, have a good side, for instance, his frank admission of his weakness, of his want of virtue and of the parious condition of his cause, should God. formake it. All his difficulties he easts into the lap of the Almighty and of Christ, in the true Divine sonship of whom he declares he believes firmly. It must, however, strike anyone who examines his prayers that he never once expresses the idea which should accompany all true prayer, viz. resignation into the hands of God and entire willingness to follow Him, to go forward, or turn back whithersoever God wills; never do we find him imploring light so as to know whether the course he is pursuing and the work he has undertaken is indeed right and pleasing to God. On the contrary, in his prayers, in his thoughts and amidst all his inner conflicts, he resolutely sets aside as out of the question any idea of changing the religious attitude he has once assumed. All his striving is directed towards this one end, vis. that God will vouchsafe to further his cause and grant him victory. He, as it were, foists his cause on Heaven.

Mathemus, "Tischreden," p. 315.

For more on this mit ject see vol. v., xxxii., 6. We see this even. n. his prayers of the Wartburg.

The dominating idea which both animates his confidence and gives it its peculiar stamp, also furnishes him with a sword against the Papacy, with which he lays about him all the more vigorously the more fervently be prays. praying he blows into a flame his hatred of all who stand up for the ancient Church: in his prayers he seems to find all the monstrous accusations he intends to hurl against her. Yet he himself elsewhere reminds his hearers, that, as a preparation for prayer, they must put away all bad feeling, since our Lord warns the man who is at variance with his brother first to be reconciled to him before coming with his offering. Luther also impresses on the monks and elergy that they must not pray for what is displeasing to God . . . for instance, for strength to fulfil their obligation of cel bacy or their vows.-Might they not justly have retorted that he, too, should not insist so blindly that God should establish his work? And might not the fanaties and Anabaptists have urged a tu quoque against him when he accused them of spiritual pride and blind presumption because of their fervent prayers?

We shall not go out of our way to repeat again what we have already said of his pseudo-mysticism. But in order to understand rightly Luther's prayers and trustfulness, so frequently reminiscent of the best men of the Catholic past, it is necessary to bear in mind his peculiar mystic leanings.

Other Personal Traits. His Family Life.

Luther was able to combine in a remarkable manner his pseudo-mysticism with practical and sober common sense.

Where it is not a question of his Divine mission, of the rights of the new Evangel or of politics—of which by nature he was unfitted to judge—we usually find him eminently practical in his views. His intercourse with others was characterised by simplicity and directness, and the tone of his conversation was both vigorous and original. It was most fortunate for him that his practical insight into things so soon enabled him to detect the exaggeration and peril of the movement set on foot by the fanatics. Had he been as incautious as they, the State authorities would soon have crushed his plans. This he clearly perceived from the very outset of the movement. Something amiliar, though on a smaller scale, happened later in the case of the Antinomians. Luther was opposed to such extravagance, and, when friendly admonition proved of no avail, was perfectly ready to resort to force. Whether, from his own standpoint, he was in a position to set matters straight in the case of either of the two movements is another question; the truth is that his standpoint had suspiciously much in common with both. At any rate his encounter with the fanatics taught him to lay much less stress than formerly on the "Spirit," and to maist more on the outward Word and the presching of the "Evangel."

It must also be noted, that, though accustomed to go forward bravely and beat down all difficulties by main strength, yet in many instances he was quite open to accommodate himself to circumstances, and to yield in the interests of his cause, displaying likewise considerable ingenuity in the choice of the means to be employed. We have already had occasion more than once to see that he was by no means deficient in the wisdom of the serpent. He knew how to give favourably disposed Princes astute advice, particularly as to how they might best encourage and promote the new Church system. To acttle their quarrels and to restore concord among them he had recourse sometimes to fiery and even gross language, sometimes to more diplomatic measures. When the Elector and the Duke of Saxony became estranged by the Wurzen quarrel Luther frankly advised the former to give way, and jestingly added that sometimes there might be good reason to "light a couple of tapers at the devil's altar."

He did not, however, possess any talent as an organiser and was, generally speaking, a very imperfect judge of the social conditions of his time. (See vol. vi., xxxv.)

Heinrich Bohmer remarks justly: "Luther was no organiser. Not that he was devoid of interest in or comprehension for the practical needs of life. He was neither a secluded scholar nor a stiff-necked pedant... His practical vein, though strong enough to enable him readily to detect the weak spot in the proposals and creations of others, was, however, not equal to any independent, creative and efficient action. However bold, energetic and original as a thinker and writer, as an organiser he was clumsy, diffident and poor in ideas. In this domain he is entirely lacking in initiative, decision and, above all, in any theory he could call his own." "His regulations for public worship are no new creation but, more often than not, merely the old, Catholic ones, reduced and arranged to meet the needs of the evangelical congregation. . . . Where he is original he not seldom ceases to be practical. For instance, his extraordinary proposal that the Latin service should be retained for the benefit and edification of those familiar with the language, and his regret that it was no longer possible to arrange a service in Greek or Hebrew, can senreely be characterised as anything but a professor's whom, "1

His domestic life, owing to the simplicity, frugality and industry which reigned there, presents the picture of an impretentious family home.

With Catherine Born and the children she bore him, he "Luther's demente life deploys, as a whole a not implement perture, and its description would form the hindlest portion of a life work ready does not offer much tast is pleasing." Thus drong Evers, "Martin Lather," 6, p. 1.

Luther im Lichte der neueren Forsehung," p. 130 f. In the execute edition the closing chapter containing these passages is omitted. The companion with Colvin made by Bohmer in this same chapter on Luther's takent for organization, is also worthy of notice, that time Luther hardly had his equal as postor, preacher and writer, but, unlike Calvin, he was no born organiser or church-founder. Menes, as soon as he was confronted with the great problem how to organise the evengelon movement now becoming more and more powerful, he consed to be the ore leader and continueder of the Reformation. It is true he always remained the supreme authority to his own followers; he reigned indeed, but did not govern; he no longer inspired, instructed or gor led his fellow workers individually. In this respect, also, Calvin was his exist opposite. His position at the outset was incomparably more humble than that of Lather. Yet his reputation grew constantly, till Church and State in Geneva unhesitatingly obeyed him, whilst his aphere of action went on extending till his very death, till finally it sentenced the greater part of Western Europe (p. 131 f). Down to the year 1668, nay, down to the 19th century, the nations of the West were still engaged in the solution of the political problems with which Luther a reform had confronted them. For these Luther himwell had but slight comprehension. If anything, he rendered their solution more difficult. He however, took more interest in the legal reforms which had become necessary in consequence of his under-led-apart from the disturbances assuing from his outward controversies and inward combate—a regular life conducive to his labours. His relations with his life a partner, who was absorbed in the management of the little household, were, so it would appear, never seriously disturbed; he was as devoted to her as she was to him, striving as she did to serve him and to lighten his cares. As to her failings, viz. a certain haughtiness and masterfulness, he winked at them.

In his will dated Jan. 6, 1842, he gives, as follows, his reason for leaving everything to his "heliaved and faithful wife Catherine". "I do this first because she, as a pious, faithful and honourable wife, has always held me dear and in honour and, by God subtening, bure me and brought up five children, who are still alive and where may God long preserve."1

Incidentally he praises her completency and says that she had served him not only like a wife but like a maid. It is true, however, he save elsewhere. " Had I to marry another, I should hew mywrif an obespent wife out of stone, for I despair of any woman's obedsence. **

Him last letters to Born attent great runtual confidence, even though he does just hint in his usual joking way as their common faults. "I think, that, had you been here, you would also have ndvmed us to do this, so that then for once we should have followed your advice." "To my well-beloved housewife Catherine Lutherms, Doctoress, Zulederlessen, pork-batcheress and whatever else also may be. Grace to you and peace in Christ and my page old love . I command to God a keeping you and all the household; great all the guests. [Signed] M. L., your old sweetheart." Writing to his wife who was so anxious about hun, he mays. "You want to undertake the care of your God just as though He were not alonghty and able to create ten Dr. Martins.

. Lat Meater I'm hip read this letter, for I have not had time to write to him; console yourself with this, that I would be with you were I able, as you know, and as he perhaps also knows from experience with his own wife, and understance it all perfectly " "We are very grateful to you for your great unxiety that prerents you from alsoping . . . Do you pray and leave the rest to God. It is written: 'Cast thy care upon the Lord, and lie shall sustain thee ' (Pealtz lv.)."

His humour heiped to tide him over any minor ananymees for which Latherine and the inmates of his house were responsible. He preferred to oppose the sharid of jest to Catherine's obstanacy, to her feminise desire to interfere in business that was not here, as well as to her pealoge rule in matters pertaining to the management of the household. When in his letters he addresses ^{* &}quot;Worke," Eri. ed., 56, p. 2 f. " Ktotila Kowerou, 2, p. 467, * Letters of Jan. 25 to Feb. 14, 1644, "Werho, Let. ed., 14, pp. 346, 181 184.

282 LUTHER THE REFORMER

her as "Lord Katey," and so forth, his object was to reprove her gently for that imperiousness under which he himself had sometimes to smart. We learn from outside sources that her interference was particularly troublesome to others at the time of Luther's conflict with the lawyers on the validity of clandestine marriages, when his wife's friendly interest in cortain couples concerned displayed itself in loud and over-scalous advocacy of Luther's view of the question. It was then that Cruciger, the Wittenberg theologian, described her as the "frebrand in Luther's house."

He was not merely unable to accustom himself to the hundrum occupations connected with household management, but the annoyance it entailed was so repugnant to him that in 1438 he dissuaded a preacher who wished to marry a second time, telling him that "the management of a family is in our day the most troublesome thing on earth, so that, knowing the wickedness of the world, were I a young man I would rather die than again become a married man, even though, after my Katey, a queen were offered me in marriage." Evidently he must have found something to regret.

Both took their share in the troublesome and unpretentious work of educating and instructing the children. Luther rightly extols such labours as great and mentorious in God's sight, just as he frequently describes the seemingly lowly callings, which, in the eyes of the world, are of no account, e.g. marriage, as ennobled by God when performed by pious Christians in accordance with His Will and to the benefit of body and soul. (Above, p. 148 f.)

By means of a fairly well-ordered division of the day he found time, in the intervals of the demands made by his domestic duties, to devote long hours to the multifarious and exhausting labours of which we know something. Self-denial in the interests of the cause he had espoused, renunciation of case and enjoyment so as better to serve an end for which he was impassioned, diaregard even of the pressing claims of health—all this is not easily to be matched in any other writer of eminence and talent occupying so historic a position in public life. Luther, plugued as he was by extraneous difficulties, with his professorship, his pulpit and his care for souls, seemed to revolve the wheel of time. Without unheard-of energy and a fiery, overmastering enthusiasm for the cause his achievements would indeed be incomprehensible.

² To Bernard v. Dölen, At g. 31, 1538, "Briefwecksel," 11, p. 398.

³ "Corp. ref.," 8, p. 314: "Fax domestica." The cause of Caspar Beier, the claudestinely married student, with regard to which she fashed the flames of Luther's anger, was, according to Cruciger, "some of the best," Köstlm-Kawerau, 1, pp. 467, 571, n. 1, and p. 569 f.

The Catholic, however, when contemplating these traits so far as they redound to Luther's credit must deeply regret, that such energy was not employed in a well-ordered amelioration of the ecclesiastical system on the basis of the true Christian doctrine and in harmony with the authority divinely appointed. If he considers these favourable sides of Luther's character with befitting broad-mindedness, his grief can only deepen at the action, characterised by such perversity and contradiction, by which Luther sought utterly to destroy the existing Church and her faith as revealed and handed down.

CHAPTER XXVI

LUTHER'S MODE OF CONTROVERSY A COUNTERPART OF HIS SOUL.

Luther's Auger. His Attitude towards the Jews, the Lawyers and the Princes

What above all strikes one in Luther's mode of controversy is his utter unrestraint in his scolding and abuse. Particularly remarkable, especially in his later years, is the language which he has in readiness for two groups of foes, viz. for Jews and Lawyers; then, again, we have the invective which, throughout his career, he was fond of hurling at such Princes and scholars as did not submit to his teaching.

As, in what follows, and in studying the psychology of his anti-Papal abuse, we shall have again occasion to encounter unpleasant passages, we may well make our own the words of Sir Thomas More in his "Responsio ad convitia Lutheri," where he trounces Luther for his handling of Henry VIII.: "The gentle reader must forgive me if much that occurs offends his feelings. Nothing has been more painful to me than to be compelled to pour such things into decent ears. The only other alternative would, however, have been to leave the unclean book untouched"

The Jews.

In his earlier days Luther had been more friendly towards the Jews, and had even cherished the childsh hope that many of them would embrace the new Evangel and help him in his warfare against the Papal Antichrist. When this failed to come about Luther became more and more angered with their blasphemy against Christ, their art of seducing the faithful and their cunning literary attacks on Christian doctrine. He was also greatly vexed because his Elector, in spite of having, in 1536, ordered all Jews to leave the country,

1 " Opp.," Lovani, 1566, f. 116.

nevertheless, in 1508, granted them a conditional permit to travel through it; he was still more exasperated with Ferdinand the German King who had curtailed the disabilities of the Jews. Luther's opinion was that the only thing to do was to break their pride; he now relinguished all hope of convincing any large number of them of the truth of Christianity; even the biblical statements, according to which the Jews were to be converted before the end of the world, appeared to him to have been shorn of their value.4

Hence Luther was, above all, desirous of proving to the faithful that the objections brought forward by the Jews against Christian doctrine and their interpretation of the Old Testament so as to exclude the Christian Messias were all wrong. This he did in three writings which followed each other at short intervals: " Von den Juden und jren Lagen," "Vom Schem Hamphoras," both dating from 1548, and "You den letzten Worten Davids" (1543). Owing to his indignation these writings are no mere works of instruction, but in parts are crammed with libel and scurrilous abuse.*

In the first of these tracts, for metance, he voices as follows his opinion of the religious learning of the Hebrews: "This passage the Ten Commandments as far above the comprehension of the blind and hardened Jess, and to discourse to them on it would be as useless as preaching the Gospel to a pig. They eannot green the nature of God's law, much less do they know how to keep it." "Their boast of following the external Mosaic ordinances whilst disobeying the Ten Commandments, fits the Jewa just as well as ornaments do as evil woman '; " yet clothes, adomments, garlands, jewele would serve for better to deck the now that wallows in the mire than a strumpet."*

One print which well illustrates his anti-Semitern is the Telmud-Bible he invente as hest suited to them: "That Bible only should you explore which has sencesled beneath the sow's ted, the letters that drop from it you are free to est and drink , that is the best Bible for prophete who trample under foot and rend in an awinish a manner the Word of the Divine Majesty. which ought to be listened to with all respect, with trembling and with joy." "Do they fancy that we are clock and wooden blocks like themselves, the rude, ignorant donkeys to . . . Hence, gentle Christian, howeve of the Jews, for this book will show you that God's enger has delivered them over to the devil."

Mathemus, "Tischenden," p. 316
 Cp. Reinhold Lawin, "Lathers Stellung au den Jüden." ("N. Stad. auf Gesch. der Theol. und Kierhe," 10), 1911.
 Stad. auf Gesch. der Theol. 22 p. 135.
 Ibid. p. 177 f.

286 LUTHER THE REFORMER

The figure of the sow's tail pleased him so well that he agent used it later in the same year in his "Vore believe Hamphoras." There he alliedes to the piece of sculpture which had originally supposed him with the idea i. "Here, as Wittenberg, estude our passes church there is a new chardout in the stone, under her me jugiets and lattic Jown all micking; behind the new stacids a Rabbi, who lifts, with his right hand the new a haid by and with his left her tail, and a intently suggest puring over the Talmud under the news tail, as though he waited to read and bring to light amounthing approachly slover. That is a real image of Schem Hamphoras. For of the about wise man we Germans my: Where did he read that f. To speak coarsely, in the rear parts of a new."

The "devil" also is drawn into the fray the better to enable Eather to vent his ire against the Jees. At the end of the passage past quoted he save. "For the david has enseed into the Jows and holds them exprise so that perforce they do his will, as St. Paul mys, merking, defaming, abusing and runing God and everything that in His . The devil plays with there is their esernal demonstron.' And observers in Venly a hope The devil plays with there to fine, without, vertication and devilor thing in the existence of these Jews, who for fourtees hundred years have been, and still are our pest, terment and mistortune. In fine, they are just devils and nothing more, with no feeling of humanity for us heathen. This they learn from their Rabbis in those devils' across which are their schools. "-" They are a broad of vipors and the children of the devil, and are as headly disposed to us as to the devil their father." . " The Turk and the other heathen do not eafler from these what we Chascasse do from these management onnies and .crps., . . Whoever would like to cherals such adders and puny devise—who are the worst enemies of Christ and of in all—to befriend them and do them homour simply in order to be chested, plandered robbed, dogmend and forred to how! and curse and suffer every land of exit, to him I would commend them Jours. And if this he not everyly let him tell the Jew to use his mouth as a privy, or elastrawl into the Jewis hind parts and there worship the hely thing, so as afterwar is to be able to beast of baying been more ful, and of having helled the deval and his progeny to binephenie our dear Lord. 1. The last chase would supports have been as ned at the Constant Mansfeld, who had advered a large marker of Jews to acttle in Eastebur, Lither's birthplace,

The temporal happeness which the Jews looked for under the reign of their Messaus, Lather graphically compares to the felicity of a new ; "For the new seems it were on a feather bed whether in the street or on the manure-heap; she rests seems, grants contentedly, sleeps scuadly, fears neither lord nor king, neither death nor help neither death nor help neither death nor help neither death and death until it is upon her. . Of what use would ^{* &}quot;Werke," Erl. ed., 32, p. 298.

^{*} Ibid., p. 242. * Ibid., p. 244 f.

[·] Ibid

^{*} Ibid., p. 344 f.

the Jews' Message he to me if he could not help poor me against this great and horrible dread and misfortune [the fear of death], nor make my life a tenth part as happy as that of the sow ? I would much rather any. Dear God Almighty, heep Your Monnias for Yourself, or give him to those who want him; as for me, change me into a sow. For it is better to be a live put than a man who is everlastingly dving."1

Such passages as the above are frequently to be met with in Luther's writings against the Jews. In them his object plainly was to confute the misinterpretation of the Bible and the acoffing objections to which Jewish acholars were given. Yet so utterly ungovernable was the author's passion that it spoiled the execution of his noble task. He scarcely knew how to conduct a controversy without introducing nows. devils and such like.

Was it really to Luther's credit that the sty should loom so large in his struggle with his foes?

Duke George he scolds as the "Dresden pig." and Dr. Eck an " Pig-Eck", the latter Luther promises to answer as such a way "that the saw's belly shall not be too much safisted." The Bishops of the Council of Constance who burnt Hus are "hours", the "brutles of their backs rise on end and they what their enouts." Ernemus "carries within him a cow from the herd of Epicurus "4. The learned Catholics of the Universities are hogs and donkeys decked out in finery, whom God has sent to punish us; these "devils' masks, the monks and learned spectrus, from the Schools we have endowed with such huge wealth, many of the doctors, preachers, masters, prects and friers are leg, coarse, corpulant denkeys, decked out with hoods red and brown, like the market sow in her glass bouls and timed chains."4

The same simile is, of course, employed even more frequently of the peasants. "To-day the peasants are the merent hogs, whilst the people of position, who once proded themselves on being bucks, are beginning to copy them "4-The Papiste have "stamped the married state under feet "; their clorgy are " like pigs in the fattening pon," " they wallow in fifth like the pig in his sty "!- The Pupute are fed up by their literary men. as befits such pigs as they. "Est, piggies, est! This is good for you." "—We Gormans are "hopeless pigs."

- "Werke," Erl. ed., 32, p. 201. Cp. vol., i.i. p. 200 f.
 "Werke," Wesm. ed., 7, p. 27, ; Erl. ed., 27, p. 206.
- * Ibid., Erl. ed., 45, p. 79 4 See vol. 11, p. 280,
- Worke," Wesm. ed., 18, p. 60 f.; Erl. ed., 22, p. 196.
 Cordatus, "Tagebuch," p. 137
- Warke," Wesm. ed , 19, p 306 , Erl. ed., 40, p. 250 f
 To Caspac Miller, March 18, 1635 , "Briefwechsel," 10, p 137, Werks," Wesm. ed., 23, p. 149; Erl. ed., 20, p. 64. Scrabovs, vol. sii., M f.

Henry of Brunswick is "as expert in Holy Writ as a now is on the harp." Let him and his Papiets confess that they are "verily the devil's whore church." "You should not write a book," Luther tells han, "until you have heard as old sow s-; then you should open your jaws and say: Thank you, lovely nightingale, now I have the text I want. Stick to it; it will look fine printed in a book against the Scripturets and the Elector, but have it done at Wolfenbuttel. Oh, how they will have to hold their noses 1 172

Another favourite image, which usually accompanies the sow, is provided by the donkey. Of Clement VII. and one of his Bulls Luther mays: "The donkey pitched his bray too high and thought the Germans would not notice it." Of Emeet and the Catholic Professors he writes: "Were I ignorant of logic and philosophy you rude asses would be after setting yourselves up as logicians and philosophers, though you know as much about the business as a donkey does shout music "4. Of Alveld the Franciscan he says: "The donkey does not understand music, he must rather be given thistles." The fanatics too, naturally, could not expect to escape. All that Luther says of heavenly things is wasted upon them. "They understand it so little as the donkey does the Paalter."

The devil, however, plays the chief part. Luther's considered judgment on the Zwinglians, for instance, is, that they are "soul-cannibals and soul-assassing," are "endeviled, devilish, yea, ultra-devilish and possessed of blasphemous hearts and lying lips."

The Lawyers.

Luther's aversion for the "Jurists" grew yearly more intense. His chief complaint against them was that they kept to the Canon Law and put hindrances in his way. Their standpoint, however, as regards Canon Law was not without justification. " Any downright abrogation of Canon. Law as a whole was out of the question. The law as then practised, not only in the ecclesiastical but even in the secular courts, was too much bound up with Canon Law; when it was discarded, for instance, in the matrimonial cases, dire legal complications threatened throughout the whole of the German Empire." To this Luther's eyes were not sufficiently open.

" Werke, Erl. ed., $63, p. 56 f. | Ibid., 251, p. 192. * Ibid., p. 56 * Ibid., 251, p. 1 * Ibid., Weim. ed., 7, p. 676; Erl. ed., 27, p. 292.

¹ Ibid., 26. p. 351=30, p. 224. * Hod 6, p. 302 = 27, p. 110. ' Ibid Erl. ed. 32, p 404. Köstlin-Kawerau, 2, p. 469.

His crusade against the validity of chardestine engagements which he entered upon in opposition to his friend and co-religiousit, Hieronymus Schurf, his colleague in the faculty of jurispendence at the University of Wittenberg, was merely one episode in his resistance to those who represented legalism as then established.

In another and wider sphere his relations with those lawyers, who were the advisers at the Court of his Elector and the other Princes, became more strained. This was as a result of their having a hand in the ordering of Church business. Here again his action was scarcely logical, for he himself, forced by circumstances, had handed over to the State the outward guidance of the Church; that the statesmen would intervene and settle matters according to their own ideas was but natural; and if their way of looking at things failed to agree with Luther's, this was only what might have been foreseen all along.

In a conference with Molarchthon, Americal and others in Dec., 1838, he complained bitterly of the lawyers and of the "masery of the theologiess who were attacked on all aides, especially by the raighty". To Melchior Kling, a lawyer who was present, he said: "You jurists have a finger in this and are playing us tricks; I advise you to coase and come to the assistance of the nobles. If the theologians fall, that will be the end of the jurists too," "Do not worry us," he repeated, "or you will be paid out." "Had he ten sons, he would take mighty good sare that not one was brought up to be a lawyer." "You jurists stand as much in need of a Luther as the theologians did." "The lawyer is a fee of Christ, he extels the right-courses of works. If there should be one amongst them who knows better, he is a wonder, is forced to beg his bread and is shumed by all the other men of law."

On questions affecting conscience he considered that he close, as theologian and leader of the others, had a right to decide; yet countiess cases which earns before the courts touched upon matters of conscience. He exclaims, for instance, in 1531: Must not the lawyers come to me to learn what is really lawful? "I am the supreme judge of what is lawful in the dornam of conscience." "If there be a single lawyer in Germany, say, in the whole world, who understands what is 'lawful de pare' and 'lawful de facto' then I am ... surprised." The recorder adds : "When the Doctor aweers thus he means it very accounty." Lather precede: "Is fine, if the juriete don't crave forgiveness."

19.—U

^{* &}quot;Colleg.," ed. Birdseil, I, p. 389 seg. The date, Dec. 4, 1838, panet be taken for what it is worth.

and crawl humbly to the Evangel, I shall give them such a doing that they will not know how to escape." 1

Thus we can understand how, in that same year (1531), when representatives of the secular law interfered in the ecclesisatical affairs at Zwickau against his wishes, he declared: "I will never have any more dealings with those Zwicken people, and I shall carry my resentment with me to the grave." "If the hawyers touch the Canona they will fly in splinters. . . . I will fling the Catechusm into their midst and so upset them that they won't know where they are." If they are going to feed on the "filth of the Pope-Ass," and "to put on their horns," then he, too, will put on his and "toes them till the air resounds with their howis." This from the pulpit on Feb. 23, 1839.*

The Princes.

With what scant respect Luther could treat the Princes is shown in his work "Von welltlicher Überkeytt, wie weyt man yhr Gehorsam schuldig sey " (1528),4

Here he is not attacking individual Princes as was the ease, for instance, in his writings against King Henry of England, Duke George of Saxony and Duke Henry of Brunswick, hence there was here no occasion for the abuse with which these polemical tracts are so brimful. Here Luther is dealing theologically with the relations which should obtain between Princes and subjects and, according to the title and the dedicatory note to Johann of Saxony, professes to discuss calmly and judicially the respective duties of both. Yet, carried away by vexation, because the Princes and the nobles had not complied with his request in his "An den christlichen Adel" that they should rise in a body against Rome, and reform the Church as he desired. he bitterly assails them as a class.

Even in the opening lines all the Princes who, I ke the Emperor. held fast to the often fasth and sought to preserve their subjects in it, were put on a par with "hair-brained fellows" and loose "rogues." "Now that they want to fleece the poor man and wreak their wantonness on God's Word, they mill it obedience to the commands of the Emperor. . . . Because the ravings of such fools leads to the destruction of the Christian faith, the denial of God a Word and blaspheny of the Divine Majesty, I neither can nor will any longer look on calmly at the doings of my ungracious Lords and fretful squires."*

Behlogerhauten, "Aufzeichnungen," p. 14. * Ibid., p. 8 f. On Invocavu Bunday, Kostlur-Kawerau, 2, p. 471.

See vol. n. pp. 297-305 fl.
 Werke," Weam, ed., 11, p. 246 ft.; Erl. ed., 22, p. 62 f.

Of the Princes in general he says, that they ought " to rule the sountry and the people outwardly; this, however, they neglect. They do nothing but rend and fleece the people, heaping impost upon impost and tax upon tax, letting out, here, a bear, and there, a wolf; nor is there any law, fidelity or truth to be found in them, for they behave in such a fashion that to call them robbers and scoundrals would be to do them too great an honour. . . . So well are they earning the hatred of all that they are doomed to penals with the montes and persons whose rescality they share."

It is here that Luther tells the people that, "from the beginning a wise Prince has been a rare find, and a pious Prince something rarer still. I sually they are the biggest fools or the most arrant knaves on earth; hence one must always expect the worst from them and little good, particularly in Divine things which pertain to the salvation of souls. For they are God's letters and hangmen "5". "The usual thing is for languaged 4 to be verified: "I will give children to be their princes, and the effections shall rale over them." "a

We have to look on while "secular Princes rule in spiritual matters and spiritual Princes in secular things." In what else does the devil's work on earth consist but in making fun of the world and turning it into a pantomime."

In conclusion he hints to the Process plainly that the " mob and the common folk are beginning to see through it all."4

A Protestant writer, in extenuation of such dangerous language against the rulers, recently remarked: "It never entered Luther's head that such words might bring the Princes into contempt and thus, indirectly, promote rebellion. . . . If we are to draw a just conclusion from his blindness to the obvious psychological consequences of his words, it can only be, that Luther was no politician."

It may, indeed, be that he did not then sufficiently weigh the consequences. Nevertheless, in his seurmous writings against individual Princes he was perfectly ready to brave every possible outcome of his vituperation. "What Luther wrote against the German Princes," justly remarks Dollinger, "against Albert, Elector of Mayence, against the Duke of Brunswick and Duke George of Saxony, puts into the shade all the libels and acreeds of the more recent European literature."

One of the chief targets for his shafts was the Archbishop of Mayence.

Albert, Elector of Mayenes, "is a plagua to all Germany: the ghastly, yellow, earthers has of his consistence on much result in a minute of much and blood—exactly fits his character ; . . . he is deserving of death. under the First Table " (via because of his transgrames of the first commandments of the Decalogue by his after godiessnam). It was, however, not so much on account of his more shortcomings, notorious though they were, but more particularly because he did not take his aids, that Luther reported him as a "most pertidious rogue" (* nebule perfetuenmes "). " If theres are hanged, then surely the Hebop of Mayence deserves to be hanged as one of the first, on a goldows seven turne as high as the Oschumstern . . . For he fears neither God nor man." When Senion Lauringes, the Hammurt, graved Archbehop Albert is a few opigrams, Luther's anger turned against the poet, where he soundry rated for making " a ment out of a deval." He amend a cort of mandate against Livernus of which the conclusion was: " I her our people, and particularly the posts or his [the Archhubor, a) even phants, in future not publicly to prame the shamafal merd-priort"; he threaters sharp measures should sevene at Wittenberg dare to prame " the colf condemned lost pricet, "

The asternal list of relice which, in 1843, he published with a preface and ecologue against the same Elector amounted practically to a libel, and was described by fawyers as a lying slander punishable at law. As a "libellus fomonis" against a sugning Prince of the Empire it might have entacked extrago econogument for its author.

In it Lather says: The Elector, as we learn, is offering "bug perdons for many men," even for men to be committed for the next ten years, to all who "help in declarg out in new clothes the poor, maked become ; the relice in question, during their translation from Halie to Mavence, had, so Luther tetis un, been augmented by other "particles," enriched by the Pope with Indulgances, amongst them, "(1) a fine piece of the left horn of Muses, (2) three flames from the beek of Mouse on Mount flows; , 2) two feethers and one egg of the Holy Ghost," etc., an all, twelve articles, specially chosen to excite derison.

Justua Jorna appears to have been shocked at Luther's ribuidry and to have given Luther an account of what the lawyors were saving. At any gate, we have Lather's recily in his own handwriting, though the top part of the letter has been torn away. In the bottom fragment we read: " [Were it really a bhell which, however, it cannot be yet I have the authority, night and power [to we to useh libels] against the Carrinal, Pope, devil and all their crew, and not to have the term "liberius famorus" haried at me. Or have the 'assaults -I bug your purden, parate-studied their jurisprudence in such a way as to be ignorant of what "autoettem" and "finis" mean in secular law? (the end in his eyes was a good one). If I have to teach them, I shall exact smaller fees and teach them unwashed. How has the beautiful Montaburgh [belonging to the see of Mayerce] been turned into a donkeystable! If they are ready to pupe, I are quite writing to denot, and, if I live, I hope to trend yet another measure with the bride of Mayonce."1 Thus the revolting untruths to which his tactics led han to have recourse, the better to excite the minds of the people, seemed to him a fit subject for jest; in spite of the wounds which the religious warfare was inflicting on the German Church he still saw nothing unstemly in the figure of the dance and the bridal festivity.

Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 130 f. * Briefe "ed. De Weite, I, p. 504 f., I, p. 219 ff.; "Heinfwichnel des Justin Jenne," ed. G. Kaweren, 2, p. 44. The "printed Handois" new of need to the church door. "Cp. E. Michael (" Zeitsicht f. hath. Theol.," 18, 1895), p. 455 ff.

An incident of his controversy with the Duke of Brunswick may serve to complete the picture. In 1540, during the hot summer, numerous fires broke out in North and Central Germany, causing widespread alarm; certain alleged Incendianes who were apprehended were reported to have confessed under torture that this was the doing of Duke Henry of Brunswick and the Pope. Before even investigations had commenced Luther had already jumped to the conclusion that the real author was his enemy, the Catholic Duke, backed up by the Pope and the monks, for had not the Duke (according to Luther) explained to the burghers of Costar that he recognized no duties with regard to heretics $1 The Franciscans had been expelled and were now in disguise everywhere " plotting vengeance"; they it was who had done it all with the assistance of the Duke of Brunswick and the Elector of Mayence, who, of course, remained behind the seenes 4 14 If this be proved, then there is nothing left for us but to take up arms against the monks and priests; and I too shall go, for miscreants must be slain like mad dogs."4 Hieronymus Schurf, as the cautious lawyer he was, expressed himself in Luther's presence against the misuse of torture in the case of those accused and against their being condemned too hastily. Luther interrupted him: " This is no time for mercy but for rage ! " According to St. Augustine many must suffer in order that many may be at peace; so is it also in the law courts, "now and again some must suffer injustice, so long as it is not done knowingly and intentionally by the judge. In troublous times excessive severity

<sup>Briefe," ad, De Wette & Seidernann, 6, p. 320 fl.
Mathanus, "Tischroden," p. 179, Aug., 1840.
Ibid., p. 180.
Ibid., p. 171. Stall more strongly against the Francuscum on</sup> p. 100, must be overlooked."1 He became little by little so convinced of the guilt of Henry the "incendary" and his Papists, that, in October, 1540, he refers half-jestingly to the reputation he was acquiring as "prophet and apostle" by so correctly discerning in the Papists a mere band of criminals. 1 He also informed other Courts of the supposed truth of his surmise, viz. that "Harry of Brunswick has now been convicted as an arch-incendiary-assassin and the greatest scoundred on whom the sun has ever shone. May God give the bloodhound and werewolf his reward. Amen." Thus to Duke Albert of Prussia on April 20, 1541.

Considerably before this, in a letter to the same princely patron, he expressly implicates in these absurd charges the Pope, the chief object of his hate: After telling Albert of the report, that the Duke of Brunswick "had sent out many hundred incendiaries against the Evangelical Estates" of whom more than 800 had been "brought to justice," many of them making confessions implicating the Duke, the Bishop of Mayence and others, Luther goes on to say that the business must necessarily have been set on foot "by great people, for there is plenty of money."

"The Pope is said to have given 80,000 duests towards it. Thu is the sort of thing we are compelled to hear and endure, but God will repay them abundantly . . . in hell, in the fire beneath our feet."4

"The Doctor said," we read in the Table-Talk, taken down by Mathesius in September (2-17), 1540: "The greatest wonder of our day is that the majesty of the Pope who was a terror to all monarchs and against whom they dared not move a muscle, seeing that a glance from him or a movement of his finger sufficed to keep them all in a state of fear and obedience—that this god should have collapsed so atterly that even his defenders loathe him. Those who still take his part, without exception do this simply for money's sake and their own advantage, otherwise they would treat him even worse than we do. His maire has now been thoroughly exposed, since it is certain that he sent eighteen

¹ Mathesius, "Tischrodon," p. 202

3 "Werke," Erl, ed., 55, p. 301

3 "Werke, " Erl, ed., 55, p. 301 Ibid., p. 292 f. Letter of Oct. 10, 1540. De Wette, 5, p. 308, also hos 80,000 ducats. In the passage that follows latter speaks of 18,000 erosme.

thousand crowns for the hiring of incendiaries." The perfect seriousness with which he relates this in the circle of his friends furnishes an enigma.

His consciousness of all that he had accomplished against the Pope, combined with his hatred of Catholicism, seems often to cloud his mind.

Luther's Excuse: "We MUST Ourse the Peps and. His Kingdom"."

In Luther's polemics against the Pope and the Papists it is psychologically of importance to bear in mind the depth of the passion which underlies his furious and incessant abuse.

The further we see into Luther's soul, thanks especially to his familiar utterances recorded in the Table Talk, the more plainly does this overwhelming enmity stand revealed. In what he said privately to his friends we find his unvariabled thought and real feelings. Far from being in any sense artificial, the intense annoyance which rings throughout his abuse seems to rise spontaneously from the very bottom of his soul. That he should have pictured to himself the Papacy as a dragon may be termed a piece of folly, nevertheless it was thus that it ever hovered before his mind, by day and by night, whether in the cheery circle of his friends or in his solitary study, in the midst of ecclesiastical or ecclesiastico-political business, when engaged in quiet correspondence with admirers and even when he sought in prayer help and comfort in his troubles

In Lauterbach's Disry we find Luther describing the Pope as the "Beast," the "Dragon of Hell" towards whom "one cannot be too hostile," as the "Dragon and Crocochie," whose whole being "was, and still is, rescallty through and through." "Even were the Pope St. Peter, he would still be godless." "Whoever wakes to glorify the Blood of Christ must needs rage against the Pope who blasphemes it "" "The Pope has mid Christ's Blood and the state of matrimony, hence the money-hag [of this Judis] is check full of the proceeds of robbery. . . . He has beaned and brended me, and stuck me in the devil a behind. Hence I am going to hang him on his own keys." This he said

Matheans, "Tuchreden," p. 213.

¹ Werke," Werm, ed., 29, p. 762; Erl. ed., 36, p. 410. See below, p. 304.

² Lauterboch, "Tegebuch" p. 171. * P 64. * P 25,

[•] P 140. P 64. P 30.

when a carleature was shown him representing the Pope strong up next to Judes, with the latter's money-bag.

"I am the Pope's devil," so he declared to his companions,

"hence it is that he hates and persecutes me."*

And yet the chief enme of this executed Papers was its nonacceptance of Luther's innovations. The legal measures taken formula him agreeably with the older law, whether of the State of of the Church were no proof of "haired," however much they might lame his own protonsions.

In other notes of his conversations we read: "Formerly we looked at the Pope's face, now we look only at his pesterior, in which there is no insperty". "The city of Bonie now her minigled and the devit his discharged over it his 68th, i.e. the Pope. " It is a true anying, that, " if there he a hell, Rome is built upon it."

"African all the Romans are now sunk in Epicurum, they trouble thermolyes not at all about God or a good conscience. Alack for our times? I used to believe that the Epicurean doctrine was dead and buried, yet here it is still flourishing."

At the very exminencement of the Diary of Cordition, Luther Is recorded as saying: "The Pope has lost his cunning. It is Stuped of him still to seek to lead people astroy under the pretence of religion, now that mankind has seen through the devil's trickery. To maintain his kingdom by force is equally foolish because it in impracticable "!—He proceeds in a similar etrain : "The Papinta, like the Jews, family that everyone who wishes to he saved must observe their ceremonies, hence they will presh like the Jews. 25. He male mostly quotes as old rhyme in connection with the Pow, who is both the "head of the world." and "the beast of the earth," and, in support of this, adduces ebundant quotations from the Aperalities. -- When Daniel declared that Antickent would trades neither about God nor shout wernes our 27), this mount that " the Pape would recogtree neither Gid nor lawful wives, that, in a word, he would despite religion and all domestic and notial life, which all turned on womankind. Then imy we understood what was foretold, was that Antichrist would despute all laws, ordinances, statutes, rights and every good anage, conterns kings, princes, empires mid everything that exists in beaven or on earth mere y the better to extol his fend inventions. - It is difficult to assume that all this was more risetorie, for, ther, why was it permited in 1 Intentionally hyperbolical atterances are as a rule brief. In these conversations, however, the tone never changes, but merely becomes at times even more emphatic.

On the same page in Cordatus we read: " Children are bucky in that they come into the world naked and penniless; for the

P 163. "Werke," Erl. ed., 62, p. 430, "Tischreden."

[·] Ibid.

<sup>Ibid., p. 441, and Schlegenhaufen, "Aufzeichnungen" p. 100.
Lauterbach, "Tageboch," p. 190. Cp. Schlegenhaufen p. 3
P. 2. P. 3.
P. 3.
P. 9.</sup>

Pope leves tall on everything there is on the carth, save only upon baptum, because he can't help it "1. And suspectately after: "The Pope has essend to be a teacher and has become, as his Decretals testaly, a bully-server and speculator. In the Decretain he treats not at all of theological matters but movely pursure three soff-areking ends: First, he does everything to strengthen his domination; secondly he does his best to set the kings and princes at loggerheads with such other whenever he Wants to score off one of the great, in doing which he down first scruple to show eponly his malice; thirdly, he plays the devil ment canningly, when, with a friend y air, he aliays the disertmone he had previously started up among the sovereigns; thus, however, he only does when his own ends have been achieved. He amo perverts the truth of God's Word [thus invading the threlegical field). Thus, however, he does not do as Pope, but as Antichnet and God's real enemy."*

The whole mountain of abuse expressed here and in what follows rests on this last gasgraption, vis. that the Pope perverts "the trush of God's Word " | thunks to this the Wittenhorg Professor fancial he could everthrow a Church which had fifteen conturies behind it. His hate is just as deeply gooted in his soul.

as his delusion concorning his special call.

According to the German Colloquies the Pope, like Mohammed, "began under the Emperor Phoess": "The prophery of the Apocalygue) includes both, the Pope and the Turk ". Still, the Pops to the ' best ruler " for the world, because he does know how to govern; "he is lord of our fields, meadows, mosey, houses and everything clos, yea, of our very bodies", for this "he repays the world in everlasting curses and maledictions; this is what the world wants and it duly returns thanks and known has feet," " He is rather the lawyers' than the threelogiann' god."*

He is determined to turn me." straightway into a slave of em." and to force me to " blospheme," but motered of " deep ng Grd " I shall withstand the Pope ; " etherwise we would willingly have borns and and ared the Papel rate," !—" No words are but enough to describe the Pope. We may call him macriy, godiess and idolatrous, but all this falls far short of the mark. It is impossible to grasp and put into words his great infames;" in short, as Christ envs. " he is the abcommation of desciation standing in the Holy Place."

The Pope is indeed the "father of abominations and the possoner of souls," . "After the devil the Pope is a real devil " 'After the devil there is no worse sine than the Pope with he lies and his man-made ordinances" . " in fact, he is a meaked devil incurnate.15 No one can become Pope union he be a finished and consummate knows and macreant,"15. The Pope is a

P. S. P. 10
 Worke, "Erl. ed., 62, p. 791, "Tuckreden."
 Hed., 60, p. 227 f., in chapter marks of the Table Table.
 Worke," Erl. ed., 63, p. 68.
 Hed., 67, p. 60.
 Hed., p. 214.
 Jod., p. 214. 10 Ited., 63, p. 222. 23 Ibid., 60, p. 180. 10 Jour. p. 194.

"lion" in strongth and a "drapon" in craft! He is "an outand-out Jew who extels in Christ only what is material and temporal " in nections to say, he is " far worse than the Turk," "a mere idolater and alays of Satan," 4 " a painted lung but in reality a flithy pretence, '* his kingdom is a ' Carnival show,''* and he hamed "Rat-King of the monus and suns."? Popery is full of murder: " it serves Moloch," and is the kingdom of all who blaspheme God.

"For the Pope is, not the shepherd, but the devil of the Churches; this comforts me as often as I think of it."10

" Anno 1539, on May 0," we read in those Colloquies, " Dr. Martin for three hours held a severe and carnest Dispusation in the School at Wittenberg, against that horrid monster, the Pope, that real werewo I who excels in fury all the tyrants, who alone wishes to be above all law and to act as he pleases, and even to be worshipped, to the loss and damnation of many poor souls. , . . But he is a donkey-lung [he said] . , . I hope he has now done his worst [now that I have broken his power]; but neither ure the Paperta ever to be trusted, even though they agree to proce and bind themselves to it under seal and aign-manual. Therefore let us watch and pray ($^{++1}$

The Disputation, of which all that is known was published by Paul Draws in 1495,14 dealt principally with the question, which had become a vital one, of arrived revistance to the forces of the Empire then intent on variations the rights of the Pope. The Theses solve the question in the affirmative. . The Pope is no 'authority' ordained by God . . . on the centrary he is a robber, a 'Bearwolf' who gul, a down everything. And just no everybody rightly errics to destroy this monster, so also it is everyone a duty to suppress the Pope by force, saderd, pennace must be done by those who neglect it. If anyone is killed in defending a wild beast it is his own fault. In the same way it is not wrong to offer resistance to those who defend the Pope, even should they be Princes or Emperors."18

A German version of the third Theres (51 70) was at once sprinted. 14

* Ibid., p. 200. * Ibid., 60, p. 255. 1 P. 305. 3 lbid., 61, p. 149.

* 16sd * Ibid., 57, p. 200.

* Ibid , p. 291. ⁹ Ibid., p. 185. * Ibid., 57, p. 367 f. 10 Ibid., 60, p. 379, chapter xxvii. 33 Ibid., p. 184.

Disputationen Dr. Martin Litthers, 535-1560, ed. P. Drews, pp 532 584. Up the theres already published in Luthers. Opp. at var.," 4, p. 442 see.

10 They are thus summed up by Drews (p. 533).

14 Therein 06 . * Pupo one stead monaterim, de qua Daniel dient, qual adversatur omni Deo, etiam Deo deoriem."-Thesia 58; "Nostri Germani nound Beerwolf, quod Graci, si forte notum tilta futest, disserti dorbinam" (. c. "Rearmolf"). "Thesis file "Hac animal lupus est quidem, sed a damone arripuus, lercius annua et elabitet amnibus unabulis et armis — Thesis (v). "Ad quod appromendum necessarius est concureus omnium ponorum," etc.—Thesis 61 : " Nec est hac expectanda sudicio sententia unt consilis auctorius," etc.-Thesia 46; "Ita

Among the explanations given by Lather previous to the Disputation (' circulorner d'apmatemia) the following are worthy of note: "We will not worst up the Pupe any longer as has been deno heretefore. . . Ruther, we must fight against this Satan." . "The Poyn is such a monstrous beast that no rater or tyrant can equal him He requires us to worship his public blamberry in debases of the law; it is as though he said: I will and command that you adors the drivil. It is not erough for him to strangle me, but he will have it that even the tool is damaed at his word of command. . . . The Pope is the devil. Were I able to siny the devil, why should I not not my his in doing so? Look not on the Pour no a man, his very worshappers decises that he is no more man, but partly man and partly God. For 'God' here read devil' Just as Corest at God-made floor, as the Populas the devil measure " 12 " Who would not lend a head against the arch protilestial monster? There is nome at ser such in the whole world in he, a his exacts himtell for above God. Other welves there are indeed, yet none to impodent and imperious as this wolf had monster?

in this celebrated Inquitation come of the objections are southed in erhotastic language. Buth is the following: According to the Bible. Astachmat is to be destroyed by the breath of God a mouth and not by the sword; therefore armed resistance to the Pope and the Points is not allowed. Lather replicat * That we concede, for what we say is that he will even our and remain with an till the end of the world. He is nevertheless to be remoted, each the Emperor too, and the Princes who defend him, not on the Emperor's account, but for the value of this monstream bend "4 - Another objection rans : "Christ forbade Peter to make use of his sword against those sent out by the Phonesis, therefore aestner must we take up arms against the Popo." The reply was : "Nogobitur concequent," and Luther given am to explain. The Pope in me authority as Coupling and Printe were. He is the devil a servant, presented of the devil, a well who tyrannically carries off sount without any right or mandate.' According to the report Luther middenly relaceed into German. " If Peter went to Rome and sieu him, he would he acting rightly gives popul non-habit redinarionem," " etc. 5 Justus Josep and Cruciany also took a part, borgung forward objections in order to exercise others in relating them. This thrological tournament, with its chizy some courled in learned terminology, nuglit will rates the dispassionate listorian to while were it not for the sombre background and the sound of the religious wars for which ardent young students were being fitted and onuipped.

el papa bellum moveril, remistradum est el sicut mountre furiose el obsesse seu vere ipareking."—Thema 68 . "Nec currendum, se habest militantes sels principes, reges vel ipass accource, titulo e celenia: mesmistos."

Drown, p. 544.
 Ibid., p. 549. Given in Eather's German Works, Jona ed., 7, p. 285, and Hade ed. (Watch), 13, p. 2-38 f.
 Ibid., p. 569, Jenn ed., 285', Walch, p. 2440.
 Ibid., p. 569, Jenn ed., 285', Walch, p. 2440.

800 LUTHER THE REFORMER

What we have quoted from Luther's familiar talks and from his disputations affords overwhelming proof, were such wanting, that the frenzied outbursts against the Pope we find even in his public writings, were, not merely assumed, but really sprang from the depths of his soul. It is true that at times they were regarded as rhetorical effusions or even as little more than jokes, but as a matter of fact they bear the clearest stamp of his glowing hate. They indicate a persistent and emmently suspicious frame of mind, which deserves to be considered scriously as a psychological, if not pathological, condition; what we must ask ourselves is, how far the mere hint of Popery sufficed to call forth in him a deligium of abuse.

In his tract of 1531 against Duke George he boasted. that people would in future say, that "his mouth was full of angry words, vituperation and curses on the Papists "; that "he intended to go down to his grave cursing and abusing the miscreants", I that as long as breath remained in him he would "pursue them to their grave with his thunders and lightnings", a again, he says he will take refuge in his maledictory prayer against the Papists in order to "kindle righteous hatred in his heart," and even expounds and recommends this prayer in mockery to his opponent*in all this we detect an abnormal feature which characterises his life and temper. This abnormity is apparent not only in the interac seriousness with which he atters the most outrageous things, more beatting a madman than a reasonable being, but also at times in the very satires to which he has recourse. That the Papacy would have still more to suffer from him after he was dead, is a peoplecy on which he is ever harping: "When I die," he remarks, "I shall turn into a spirit that will so plague the bishops, parsons and godless monks, that one dead Luther will give them more trouble than a thousand living Luthers."4

No theological simile is too strange for him in this morbid state of mind and feeling. As in the case of those obsessed by a fixed idea the delusion is ever obtruding itself under every possible shape, so, in a similar way, every thought, all

[&]quot;Worke" Werm ed. 30, 3, p. 470; Erl ed., 251, p. 127
Itid. See above, p. 278. Up. Cordatus, "Tagrbuch," p. 111;
"Quando friços in corde... oppono contra me imputatem papa," etc;
"Werke," Erl. ed., 60, p. 107 f., "Colloq.," ed. Bindseil, 2, p. 294.
Schlagorhanden, "Aufanchnungen," p. "4.

his studies, his practice, learning, theology and exegesis, even when its bearing seems most remote, leads up to this central and all-dominating conviction: "I believe that the Pope is a devil incornate in diagnise, for he is Endehrest. For as Christ is true God and true man, so also is Antichrist a devil incornate "4". And yet, in the past, so he adds with a deep high, "we worshipped all his lies and idolatry."

He is very parastaking in his anatomy of the Pope-Antichrist. "The head of Antichret," he ead, is both the Pope and the Turk; a avery creature must have both body and soul; the Pope is Antichret's soul or noist, but the Turk is his flesh or body, for the latter lays waste, destroys and personates the Church of God materially, just as the Pope does an apartically." Considering, however, that he had unduly exonerated the Pope, his corrects himself and adds: And materially also; "materially, via. by laying waste with fire and eword, banging, murdering, etc." The Church, however, so he prophesies, will nevertheless "hold the bold and reset the Pope's hypochies, will nevertheless "hold the bold and reset the Pope's hypochies, will nevertheless "hold the bold and reset the Pope's hypochies of Daniel's prophecy concerning the kingdoms of the world to the Pope's downfall." The text compels us " to take the prophecy (Apire Xii. 7) as also referring to the "Papal aboramation". "The Pope shall be broken without hands and period and die of himself."

That the Pope was spiritually destroying the Church he had already asserted as early as 1020 in his "You does Basetian tou Rome": "Of all that is of Livine appointment not one jot is now observed at Rome; indeed, if anyons thought of dring what is manifestly such it would be decided as folly. They let the Gospel and the Christian faith perish everywhere and turn never a hair, moreover, every had example of muchief, spiritual and secular, flows from Home over the whole world as from an ocean of wickedness. All this the Romans length at, and whoever laments it is looked upon as a 'lion christian ['cristians'], i.e. a fool."

The strength of Luther's delusion that the Pope was Antichrest and shared the disbolical nature furnishes the chief explanation of the hopeleisly bitter way in which he deals with all those who ventured to defend the Papacy. On all mich he heaps abuse and awails them with that worst of the weapons at his cummand, via with calurary, calling into question their good faith and denying to them the character of Christians.

Johann Eck, so he assured has friends in 1838, " when at Rome, prefited splendsdly by the example of Epsourus; has short stay there was quite sufficient for him. No doubt he possesses great tolent and a good memory, but he is impudence itself, and, at the bottom of his heart, rares as bttle shout the Pope as he does about the Gospel. Twenty years ago I should never have thought it possible to find such Epicureans within the Church." 1 Eck is " a bold-lipped and bloodthirsty nighted." In 1532, concerns more indugently, Luther and ead of him: "Ecrose is no prencher. . . . Fie can indeed talk ad tab. of drinking, gambling. light women and boon companions "; what, however, he enywis his sermons he either does not take sectously or at any rate his heart is not in it * In 1542 invertheless, Luther was heard to eay: "I believe he has made himself over to the deval and entered into a bargain with him how long he will be abowed to live." As was but natural, the man who had "never really taken the defence of the Pope acnously" died impensions According to Luther he passed away without making any confemion, without even eaving, "God be gracious to me. "

Werke," Erl. ed., 00, p. 180.
 Ibid., Weim. ed., 8, p. 287 f.; Erl. ed., 27, p. 90.

802 LUTHER THE REFORMER

Could we trust Luther, Johannes Fahri, another Catholie opponent, "blasphoned himself to death." Surely thus "to us deliberately and of set purpose, exceeds all bounds."*

Josephin L. Elector of Beandenburg († 1835), who remained faithful to the Church, was abused by Luther as a "lar, madblundhound, devium Papust, marderer, traitor, desperate miscreant, assessed of souls, arch knows, duty pig and devil's child, nay, the devil himsed."

We may recall the epitheta he hestowed on Henry VIII. for having premissed to criticise him. " Crowned donkey shandoned, semeless man, exceement of higs and asses, impudent royal windbag, mad Harry, arrent feel."

Cardinal Cajetan, the famous theologian, was, according to Luther, "an ambiguous, eccretive, incomprehensible, med theologian, and as well qualified to understand and judge has course as an ass would be to play upon the harp." Hoogstraaten, the Cologue Donuriess, "does not know the difference between what is in agreement with and what contrary to Scripture, he a mad, bloodthresty murderer, a blind and hardened donley, who ought to be just to accusch for dung beetles in the manurebeaps of the Papista."

Of his attacks on Duke George of Samony, the "Dresden Amassin," we need only a entain the parting shaft he flung into his opponent's grave: "Let Pharao perish with all his tribe; even though to [the Duke] felt the prick of conscionce yet he was never study contrate. . . . Now he has been rooted out. . . .

Lauterbach, "Tagrouch," p. 180.

* See vol. m., p. 16%.

Werke," Wenn, ed., 50, 3, p. 280; Erl. ed., 25°, p. 16.
 Schlagenkaufen, "Aufzeichnungen," p. 116

Mathemas, "Taschreden," ed. Kroker, p. 268.
 Ibid., p. 207.
 Ibid., p. 249; ep. p. 115.

Letter to Carlatadt, Oct. 14, 1518, "Werke," Erl. ed., 53, p. 4 (" Briefwecksel," 1, p. 249,

God sometimes consents to look on for a while, but afterwards

He purselies the race even down to the children."

No one who in any way stood up for the Papal Decrees was safe from Luther's ungovernable abuse, not even those statesthen who followed them from necessity rather than out of any respect for the Church. Lather is determined, so he says, "not to endure the excrement and fifth of the Pope-Ass. . . For goodness' aske don't come stirring up the donkey's dung and papal fith in the churches, particularly in this town. Wittenberg). . . . The Pope detrice the whole world with his denkey's during, but why not let him out it himself? . . . Let sleeping dogs lie, this I bog of you [and do not weery me with the Pope], otherwise I shall have to give you what for. . . . I must deast, otherwise I shall get too angry."

With the real defenders of the Papal Decrees, or the olden faith, he was, however, never alread of becoming "too angry "; the only redeering feature being, that, at times the everwhelming consciousness of his functed superiority brings his caustic with to his assistance and his anger dissolves into acorn. Menus this pungent ingredient, his polenics would be accomprehenable, nor would his success have been half so great.

An example of his descriptions of such Catholics who wrote and spoke against him is to be found in his preface to a writing of Altogenheyia. He there jokingly congratulates himself on having been the means of inducing his opponents to study the Bible in order to refute him: " Lather has driven these blockheads to Holy Scripture, just as though a man were to bring a lot of new animals to a menagerie. Here Dr. Cockles [Cockleys] barks like a dog; there Brand of Berne (Johann Mensing) yells. like a fox; the Leipzig prescher of blasphemy [Johann Koss] howle like a wolf . Dr. Cura Wimpina grunts like a snorting now, and there is so much noise and chanour amongst the beasts that really I am quite sorry to have started the chase. . . . They are supposed to be conversant with Scripture, and yet are quite ignorant of how to handle it." a

In a more serious and trugic tone he points out, how many of his foes and opponents had been carried off suddenly by a Divine judgment. He even drafted a long list of such instances, supplied with hateful glosses of his

Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 206, Cp. what he says of Duke

George, above, p. 190.

Colloq, ed. Bindseil, I, p. 295

Werke, Erl. ed., 43, p. 174. On Brand of Berno ep. N. Paulus, "Die deutschen Domieskaner im Kampfeinit Luther, 1962 pp. 16-45; an p. 26-2 there is a remark of Lither a on the "pier smoking brand" which sucaped the fire of Berne," rightly taken by Paulin to apply to Recoing (Seckentert, Walch, De Wette and Erstein new of a di kreat opinion). J. Kies, the Leipzig preacher is again described by Lucher in a letter to N. Hausmann (Jan. 2, 1533, " Erre(auchies," ¶, p. 260). as a "preacher of blasphemy" own, which he alleged as a proof of the "visible action of God " in support of his enuse." Johann Koss, the " preacher of blasphemy," mentioned above, was given a place in this libellous catalogue after he had been sersed with a stroke of apoplexy in the pulpit (Dec. 28, 1582). At the instance of Duke George he had been appointed assistant preacher under Hieronymus Dungersheim, that, by means of his elocutionary talent, he might defend the town of Leipzig against the intends of the new teaching. What particularly incensed Luther was the use this preacher made of his Postils to refute him by his own words. The stroke came on him while he was vindicating the Catholic doctrine of good works. This circumstance, taken in conjunction with the "place, time and individual," was for Luther an irrefutable proof of the intervention of "God's anger." "Christ," he says, "struck down His enemy, the Leipzig shouter, in the very midst of his blasphemy."8 The scalous preacher died about a month later.

" None are more prusble," Luther says elsewhere of this incident, "than the presumptuous, such as are all the Papists." It was impossible for him to inveigh with sufficient severity against the presumption which threatened him on all sides, despite the excessive kindliness and moderation with which he occasionally credit; himself; for were not those who confronted him "the devil and his hirelings "? He was forced to combat the frightful presumption of these men who acted as though they were " steeped in holiness "; for in reality they are " dirty pig-mouts "; as Papists they are " at the very least, murderers, thieves and persecutors " ; bence let all rise up against the " servers of idols." 4

We must curse the Pope and his kingdom and revile and

* "Colloq.," ed. Bindsell, 1, p. 154. Under the heading "Morter presenterum," the last commences with the words : " Pauci presente fire servicule observant," It contains the names of Richard von Greifenklau, Architehop of Treves, Erpest Count of Manafeld, Count Greifenblau, Architehop of Treves, Ernest Count of Manafeld, Count Wartenberg. Dr. Matthess Henning aon of Henning the lawyer, Carear Piling, Charcellor of Treves, and, hences, a catholic preacher at Lespaig, a minuter who had failed away from Luthersman at Kunewalde, a monk who was alleged to have apolen against the Aposto Paul and a Silvaian Doctor of Divinity. Then followed various additions. Cp. N. Paulus. "Luther there das act hams Ends sectors Gegner." ("Katholik," 1899, 2, pp. 490-505).

Letter to Nicholas Haustrain. Jan. 2, 1533, "Briefwechsel," 9, 260.

Cordatus, "Tagebach," p. 289.

All of the above expressions are taken from the first pages of Wastier den Radio plus size Meintainchen Pfafferer." 1526).

"Wittder den Radic ilag der Meintziechen Pfafferey" (1526).

abuse it, and not close our jaws but preach against it without crasing. There are some now who say we are capable of nothing else but of damning, scolding and slandering the Pope and his followers." "Yes, and so it must be,"1

Elsewhere he hints which yilely vulgar terms of opprobrium were to be applied to the Pope, and, after instancing them, adds: " It is thus that we should learn to make use of these words." The Catholic Princes were also aimed at in this instruction which occurs in one of his sermons. Thus discourse, pronounced on Jan. 12, 1581, at a time when the intervention of the hostile secular powers was feared, was printed ten years later under the title "Ein troutlich Unterneht wie man sich gegen den Tyrannen, so Christum und sein Wort verfolgen halten soll."1

"Our mad and raving Princes," he says, "are now raging and blustering and planning to root out this teaching. Whoever is desirous of devoting himself to Christ must daily be ready to suffer any peril to life and limb." Amongst the grounds for encouragement he adduces in the fact that even his very foes admitted, "that we preach and teach God's Word; the only thing amiss being, that it was not done at their hidding, but that we at Wittenberg started it all unknown to them." He calls the angry Princes "great merd-pots," who are "kings and rulers of the pig-sty of the earth where the belly, the universal cesspool, reigns supreme." "But we will be of good cheer and put our fingers to our noses at them"; because we hold fast to Christ therefore we suffer persecution from the world. " Who is the Pope, that he should be angry? . . . A sickly, smelly scarecrow." "The Pope says: I will excommunicate you, thrust you down to the abyss of hell. [I tell him] Stick your tongue in my - I am holy, am baptised, have God's Word and His Promises to proclaim, but you are a sickly, syphilitic sack of maggots. It is thus that we should learn to make use of these words."8

Cp. below, p. 220, n. 15, and p. 323, n. 2.

Google

¹ Ibid., 28, p. 868=36 p. 410.—For the tone of Luther's polymen against his theological opponents among both the Catholius and the Protestants, ep. vol. ii., p. 153 f, where the opinions of contemporaries, and friends of Luther's immediate circle are given. For further entireme of Catholic contemporaries see below, p. 251 ff., also vol. v. xxxiii., on the extreme tension of Luther's polerator ngarest Popory towards the end of his life.

* "Works," Weim. ed., 34, I, p. 83 ff.

3. The Paychology of Lether's Abusive Language

Various Psychological Factors.

Psychologically to appreciate the phenomenon in question we must first of all take into account Luther's temperament,

To every unprejudiced observer it must be clear, that, without the unusual excitability natural to him, many of his utterances would be quite inexplicable; even when we have given due weight to Luther's ungovernable temper and all too powerful imagination they still present many difficult questions to the observer. Luther himself, as early as 1520, excuses to Spalatra his offensive language on the ground of his natural "hot-bloodedness"; as everybody knew what his temper was, his opponents ought not to annoy him as they did; yet these "monsters" only provoked him the more, and made him "overstep the bounds of modesty and decency." It is perfectly true that some of his foes did provoke him by their mode of attack, yet on the other hand his own violence usually put theirs in the shade. (See below, xxvii., 4.)

In addition to his natural impetuosity which furnishes the chief basis of the phenomenon under consideration, several other factors must also be envisaged, depending on the objects or persons arousing his indignation.

It is clear that he was within his rights when he scourged the anti-Christian blasphemy and seductive wiles of the Jews, however much he may have been in the wrong in allowing himself to be carried away by fanaticism so far as to demand their actual persecution. The same holds good of many of the instances of his ungenerous and violent behaviour towards "heretics" in his own fold. As against the many and oftentimes very pulpable defects of their position, he knew how to stand up for truth and logic, though his way of doing so was not always happy, nor his strictures untouched by his own theological errors.

Nor can it be denied that he was in the right when he awailed the real, and, alas, all too many abuses of the olden. Church. The hyely sense that, at least in this respect, he was in the right may quite possibly have fed the inward fire of his animosity to Catholics, all the more owing to his being in the wrong in those new doctrines which were his principal concern. To the assurance, and the offensive manner in which he insisted on a reform, his visit to Rome, a distorted recollection of which ever remained with him, no doubt contributed. His mind was ever reverting to the dismal picture—by no means an altogether imaginary one—of the immorality prevailing in even the highest ecclesisatical circles of Rome.

Google

Letter written soon after Feb. 18, 1520, "Briefwechsel," 2, p. 329 (.

Rome's unworthy treatment of the system of indulgences, which had afforded the occasion of his action in 1517, continued to supply new fuel for his indignation; to it he was fond of tracing back his whole undertaking. What increased his anger was the thought that it was this same Rome, whose ignoble practices both in the matter of indulgences and in other fields was notonous, who had called him to judgment. It is painful to the Catholie to have to confess that many of Luther's complaints were by no means unfounded. He will, however, call to mind the better churchmen of those days, who, though indignant at the sad corruption then prevalent, never dreamt of apostasy, knowing as they did, that even far worse scandals could never justify a revolt against the institution appointed by Christ for the salvation of souls.

Even when voicing his real grievances Luther was seldom either prudent or moderate. He never seems to have quite taken to heart the comptural injunction: "Let every man be slow to speak, slow to anger, for the anger of man worketh not the justice of God." He expounds in his Postula the Epistle where the admonition in question occurs, 1 but it is curious to note how cursorily he dismisses the words, with which, maybe, he felt somewhat out of sympathy. though here, as elsewhere, he refers to the evil consequences of any proneness to anger. On the other hand, he insists. that "our censures and rebukes" must be in accordance with the "right and true Word," i.e. with theology as he understood it.2. He prefers to devote far the greater portion of the exposition to proving his favourite thesis, that, thanks to the Evangel now proclaimed, "we have a good and cheerful conscience, stronger than all fear, sin and temptation, and containing the sure hope of life everlasting "; " it is a Word that has power to save your souls; what more can you desire?" He seems averse to inculcating that meekness which the text requires

^{* &}quot;Worke," Erl. ed., 6", p. 277 ff , on the Epatic James i, 16-21, on the 4th Sunday after Easter. * Hold., p. 280, * P. 282.

One factor which frequently fanned the flames was realousy, when, for instance, he had to deal with theological opponents who appeared to be making too small account of him. The new Evangel, he said, was endangered by none more than by the "fanatics and sacramentarinas"; to defend his personal position against them had cost him the hardest struggle of his whole life; no wonder that against them he opened wide the sluice-gates of his eloquence. He was keenly senative to any slight. "Things are going all wrong in the world," he sighed in 1532. "We are already looked upon with contempt, but let us gather up the fragments when they are cheapest, that is what I advise." Of Caristadt twelve years previous he had written: " If he has no respect for me, which of us then will be respect? And what is the good of admonishing him? I believe he reckons me one of the most learned men in Wittenberg, and yet he actually tells me to my very face that I am nobody. . . . He writes right and left just as he chooses and looks on poor Wittenberg as quite beneath his notice." Luther's vexation explains his language. A pity one of the Princes did not let him taste cold steel; if Carlstadt believed in a God in heaven, then might Christ never more be gracious to him (Luther); he was no man, but an incarnation of the evil apirit, etc.

Not merely his former friend Carlstadt but others too he accused of mordinate ambition because they wished to discredit his discoveries and his position. " It is the "gloria" that does the mischief," he said in 1540 in his Table-Talk, "Zwingh was greedy of honour, as we see from what he wrote, viz. that he had learnt nothing from me. I should indeed be sorry had be learnt from me, for he went astray. Ecolampadius thought himself too learned to listen to me or to learn from me; of course, he too, surpassed me. Carlstadt also declares: 'I care nothing for you,' and Minzer actually declaimed against two Popes, the new one

Schleginhaufen, "Aufzeichnungen," p. 115 f.

¹ P 288.

^{*} Werke," Wern, ed., 18, p. 89, Erl, ed., 29, p. 186, "Widder die hymelischen Propheten," [myself] and the old,1 All who shun us and attack us secretly have departed from the faith, like Jeckel and Grickel [Jakob Schenk and Johann Agricola]; they reached their understanding by their own efforts and learnt nothing from us! Just like Zwingh." Yet twenty-five years before (i.e. previous to his great discovery in 1515) no one "knew anything," and, twenty-one years before, he, all alone, under the Divine guidance had put the ball in motion. "Ah, acrosofic (vainglory), that's the muchief."3 Jealousy played its part also, when, in 1525, he rounded so violently upon Zwingli and the Zwinglians at Strasburg. Zwingh's crime in his eyes lay not merely in his having, like (Ecolampadius, adopted a divergent doctrine on the Euchanst, but in his claim to have been before Luther in preaching the Gospel of Christ openly according to its true meaning. Both eirenmatances contributed to Luther's ire, which, after finding year in many angry words, culminated at last in the rudest abuse of Zwingh and his "devslish" crew. Already in 1525, he wrote in the instruction for the people of Strasburg which he gave to Gregory Casel, who had come to Wittenberg to negotiate :4 " One of the parties must be the tool of Satan, i.e. either they or we." * " Christ can have no part with Belial." And, before this: "They [Zwingts and (Ecolampadius) disturb our Church and weaken our repute. Hence we cannot remain silent. If they would be vexed to see their own reputation suffer, let them also think of ours." "They ought to have held their tongues long ago [on the question of the Sacrament]; now silence comes too late." He concludes with the assurance, that their error was refuted by "the Spirit," and that it was impossible they could have any certainty concerning their doctrine, whereas he could justly boast, that he had the experience of the faith and the testimony of the Spirit (" experimentum fidei et apiritus testimonium"). "They will never win the day. It pains me that Zwingh and his followers take offence at my saying that 'What I write must be true." "

Mathesius, "Tischreden," p. 167.

^{*} Hed., p. 169, * See vol. til., p. 179 f. * Letter of Nov. 5, 1515, to Gregory Casel, "Briefwechsel," 5,

⁴ Summa, sitros opurtel esos Sathanas maxistros, vel spess, vel nos."

Apart from the doctrine on the Sacrament, the other thing which helped to annoy him stands revealed more plainly in the letter addressed on the same day to the Strasburg preachers: "We dare to boast that Christ was first made known by us, and now Zwingh actually comes and accuses us of denying Christ." Bossuet was quite right in arguing that such petty jealousy on Luther's port is scarcely to his credit.4 He quotes a criticism on Luther's behaviour by George Calixt, the famous Lutheran professor of theology at Helmstädt: "The sweetness of vainglory is so seductive and human weakness so great, that even those who despise all things and risk their goods, yes life itself, may succumb to inordinate ambition." Luther, too, had high aims; "we cannot be surprised that, even a man so large-minded as Luther, should have written such things to the people of Strasburg."8

Offended vanity played a part as great and even more obvious in Luther's furious polemics against the literary defenders of the Church. One cannot help noticing how, especially when they had succeeded in making out a clear case against him, his answer was a torrent of most unsparing abuse.

The eloquence which he had at his command also constituted a temptation. He was well aware of the force with which his impassioned language carried others away. Very little was thus needed to induce him to take up this formidable weapon which at least ensured his success among the masses. He himself revelled in the unquenchable wealth of his vituperative vocabulary, and with it he eaught the fancy of thousands who loved nothing more than a quarrel. If it be true that all popular orators are exposed to the temptation to exaggerate, to say things which are striking rather than correct, and, generally, to court the applicate of the crowd, this danger was even greater in Luther's case owing to the whole character of the controversy he had stirred up. In the midst of a stormy sea one does not speak softly.

¹ To the Strasburg preachers, Nov. 5, 1525; "Christum a nobis prime valgatum audennus gloriars, at huma negation's iam traduct nos Zuandess — thid., p. 202

² Hist, des variations des églises protestantes," Paris, 1702, 1, 80

Isalicam de controversi a theol inter Luther, et Ref., "1450, e. 53.

Luther's abuse was, however, powerful enough to be heard above even the most furious tempest.

For his work Luther required an extraordinary stimulus. He would have succumbed under the countless and burdensome labours which devolved on him had he not constantly aroused himself anew by the exercise of a sort of violence. Vituperation thus became to him a real need. When he had succeeded thereby in working himself up into a passion his mind grew clearer and his imagination more vigorous, so that he found it all the easier to borrow from the hps of the mob that rude language of which he makes such fell use. He kindles his animation by dwelling on the "vermin and running sores of Popery."

In the same way from time to time he found the need of imburdening himself of his ill-humour. The small success of his labours for the reform of morals and his other annoying experiences gave him many an unhappy hour. His bad humour found as outlet in abuse and vituperation, particularly against the enemies of the Evangel. He himself was unable to conceal the real grounds of the vexation which he vented on the Papacy, for, often enough, after storming against the Papists, he complains bitterly of his own followers' contempt for the "Word" and of their evil lives.

After the utterance already recorded: "We must came the Pope and his languous," he goes on to levy charges of the worst character against those of his own party, and pours forth on them, too, all the visis of his wrath and disappointment. It was in this connection that he said, that the Evangelicals were seven tense wome than before; for the one devil that had been expelled, seven worse had entered in, so hornbly did they he, cheat, gorge and swill and include in every vice; princes, lurds, sobles, burghers and presents alike had lost all fear of God."

Another example, taken this time from the year 1536. Full of singer against the Pope he said to a friend who held a high post. "My dear fellow, do hard a Paternoster as a curse against the Papacy that it may be smitten with the Dance of St. Vitus." He adds to "Don't mind my way of speaking, for indeed you know it well; I am coarse and rough to so sere brack, oppressed and overwhelmed with business of all kinds, that, to save my poor carcase I must sometimes indulge in a little pleasure, for, after ail, man in only human." "—an utterance psychologically valuable. The real reason for the decreasion against which he was struggling in, however, clearer in other letters dating from that time. In them we get a glimpes of his grievous versuon and annoyance with the false teachers within the Evangencial fold: "Now prophets are aroung one after the other. I almost long to be dekvered (by death) so as not to have to go on seeing so rauch muchief, and to be free at last from this kingdom of the deval. I implore you to pray to God that He would grant me Linux."

^{1 &}quot; Werke," Weim, ed., 28, p. 763; Erl, ed., 36, p. 411

^{*} To Caspar Muller, Chancellor at Mansfeld Jan 19, 1518, "Werke," Erl. ed., 55, p. 119 ("Briefewechsel," 19, p. 290).

Lastly, his outbursts against the Panacy served to cover his own anxiety of coascience.

In the same way as others who leave their Church, fling theraselves into the turned and distractions of the world in order to escape their scruples, Lather too, alloyed the reproach of his coneconce by precipitating himself into the midst of the storm he had evoked; with this advantage, that the sharp weapons of abuse and score he employed could be turned against the enemy both without and within. Accustomed as he was to trest the You're of consessors as the visco of Satas, he unlingly slung to the doubtful consolution that the stronger his abuse of his eppenents the greater his own encouragement. The evil which he detected in Popery seemed to him to lead the scale in his ewin favour. He even admits this with the most engaging frankness.

"I am quite ready to allow that the Pope a abusination is, after Christ, my greatest consolation. Hence these are hopeless sumpletons who say we should not above the Pope. Doe't be slow in abuse, particularly when the devel attacks you on Justification." He intends " to infeas courage into himself by considering the abomination and horror " of the Pope; and to " hold it up under the devil's nose," Dollinger remarks justly . * Mere [in these anxieties of conscience] is to be found at least a partial psychological explanation of that wealth of bitter abuse which murius off Luther's writings from all other literary products, ancient or medieval. . . . Not seldom be sought to deader the interior ferrors of a reproving corneronce with the nowy classour of his vituperation." *

1 To the prescher, Balthaur Rharis, Jan 17 1896, "Brief-

To the preacher, Balthour Rharis, Jan. 17 1836, "Inner-weekert," 10, p. 288, Op. p. 293; "Index, queetes eth nobis faciant turbas, gut a nobis exercised," and before this: "Opera, gued non-discretes a forma doctrines queen his housants,"

1 "Werke," Eri. ed., 60, p. 129; "Tuchreden," Dollinger "Dis Reformation," 3, p. 251, erronmusly quotes the passage as losing in Walch; it does, however, occur in Förstemann, "Tuchreden," 3, p. 136 f. The commencement is remarkable. "At times I consider that I should be note. the Pope and may: What after all in the Pope that I should bonour him, even though you | the devil) magnify him? I fee what an abomina-tion he has wrought and works even to-day! Before myself I set Christ and the forgeveness of size, but under Satan's nose I put the aborninations of the Pope. The abornination and the horser is no great that I am encouraged and am quite ready to about that," etc.

" Die Reformation," 3, p. 251,

We have just heard Luther promine to hold up the Pope's abomination to the devil's nose. This saying brings us to the principal explanation of the phenomenon under conaderation.

Connection of Luther's Abusiceness with his Mystic Persuasion of his Special Call.

Luther had brought himself to such a pitch as to see in the existing Church the devil's kingdom, to overthrow which, with its Antichrist, was his own sublime mission. This theological, anti-diabolical motive for his anger and boundless invective, throws all others into the shade.

"Even were I not earned away by my hot temper and my style of writing," he says, "I should still be obliged to take the field, as I do, against the enemies of truth." ("children of the dovi." he salls them showhere). "I am hot headed enough, nor is my pen blunt." But these fees "revel in the most hornble crimes not merely against rue, but even against God's Word." Did not Christ Himself have recourse to abuse, he sake, against the "wicked and adulterous generation of the Jews, against the broad of upons, the hypocritis and children of the devi."? "Whoever is strong in the consciousness of the truth, can display to patience towards its furnous and feromions enemies."

The more vividly be persuaded himself of his mission, the blacker were the colours in which he painted the devil of Popery who refused to believe in it, and the more straigely did there surge up from the number depths of his soul and permeate his whole bring a hatred the like of which no mortal man had ever known before. In such outbursts Lather thinks he is "raving and racing ["debacchars"] against Satan"; for instance in a letter to Melanchthon, dated from the fortress of Coheng, "from the strenghold full of devils where Christ yet reigns in the midst of His focs." Even when unable from beddy weakness to write against the devil, yet he could at least rage against him in thought and prayer; "the Pope's committee ("pertures") against God and against the common weal "supplied him with material in abundance."

God had appointed him, so we read elsewhere. "to teach and to instruct," as "an Apostic and Evangement in the German lands" (were it his intention to boast); for no knows that he teaches "by the Grace of God, whose name Satan shall not destroy nor deprive me of to all etermity"; therefore I must imparingly "expuse my back parts to the devil . . . so as to enrage him still more." To the wrath of all the devils, bishops, and princes he will pay as little heed as to the rustle of a bat's wing, nor wil, he space the "trastors and murderors."

To Spalatin som after Feb. 18, 1520, "Briefwechsel," S. p. 328 f.
 July 31, 1530, ibid., S. p. 157

As early as 1620 he revenied to an intimate friend the morbidly engagerated ideas which moved him? As an excusa for his dreadful vituperation he alogos his pseudo-myetic conception of the his and death struggle he was to engage in with the devil, and his sense of the "impeter Spiritus", this he pleads in extenuation to his friend, who would appear to have remirded him of the dangers of pride. "All condemn my carcasm," he admits, but, now that the Spirit has moved him, he may set himself on a line with the "peophets" of the Old Law who "were so harsh in their invective," say, with Paul the Apostle, whose severe consults were ever present in his mind. In fact, God Himself, according to Luther, as to some extent present in these sitter ands by means of His power and action, and, "sure enough, intends in this way to armask the inventions of man."

As compared with the interior force with which the idea. of his mission apspired him, all his violence, particularly in his polemies with the Catholic theologians and statesmen, appeared to him far too weak. Thus his "Wider Hans Worst " against the Catholic Duke of Brunswick, though recking of blood and hate, seemed to him to fall short of the mark and to be all too moderate, so at least he told Melanchthon, to all appearance quite senously. His inability ever to exhaust his indignation goes back to the idea expressed. by him in the same letter with such startling candour and conviction as to remind one of the ravings of a man possessed. by a fixed delumon: "It is certain that it is God Who is fighting." "Our cause is directed by the hand of God, not by our own wisdom. The Word makes its way and prayer glows . . . bence we might well aleep in peace were we not mere flesh." His bint at the near approach of the Last. Judgment, the many signs of which could not escape notice, more than confirms the pseudo-mystic character both of his confidence and of his bate. 4

On other occasions traces of his pet superstitions are apparent, and, when we take them together, prove beyond a doubt the unhealthy state of the mind from which they Werke," Weim, ed., 18, p. 261; Erl. ed., 66, p. 25; "Widder den Rudsening," etc., 1526.

<sup>Ang. 19, 1520, to Wencesta in Link, "Briefwechsel," S, p. 463.
April 12, 1541, "Briefe, ed The Wette, 5, p. 342; "Moor, quid mihi accideril, id tam moderatus fuerim."</sup> ^{*} Ibid., p. 34). (est em est speum (Christian) pedetentem descenders de throno ad indicium vilud exepccioticomum, multi muit nimis ingini, qua ed milii persuadent," sprang. For instance, Luther professes to know particulars. of the approaching end of the world concerning which the Bible says nothing: he also has that curious list of opponents mireculously slain by the Divine hand, and even fancies he can increase it by praying for the death of those who, not sharing his opinions, stood in his way: "This year we must pray Duke Maurice to death; we must slay him by our prayers, for he is likely to prove a wicked man." On the same occasion he also attributes to himself a sort of prophetic gift. "I am a prophet." The foretelling of future events and the fulfilment in his own person of olden prophecies and visions, and again the many mimeles and expulsions of the devil which accompany the spread of his teaching, confirm his Evangel and impress the stamp of Divine approbation on his hatred of Antichrist. Divine portents, which, however, no one but Luther would have recognised as such, were also exploited: the hirth of the monstrous Monk-Cali; the Pope-Ass fished from the Tiber; signs in the heavens and on the earth. The Book of Daniel and St. Joha's Apocalypse supplied him when necessary with the wished-for interpretation, though his far-fetched speculations would better become a mystic dreamer than a sober theologian and spiritual guide of thousands. All this was crowned by the diabolical manifestations which he himself experienced, though what he took for apparitions of the devil was merely the outcome of an overwrought mind."

This enables us to seize that second nature of his, made up of superhuman storming and vituperation, and to understand, how, in his hands, wild abuse of the Papacy became quite a system.

[&]quot; I shall put on my horne," he wrote to a friend in 1522, " and wex Setan until he has stretched out on the ground. Don't be afraid, but neither expect me to spare my gamesyers, should they be hard hit by the new movement, that is not our fault, but a judgment from above on their tyranny. '* Shortly after he wrote in a minilar strain to reassure some unknown correspondeut concerning his unusual methods of controversy: "Hence, my dear friend, do not wonder that many take offence at my Dollinger, "Die Reformation," 1, p. 266, from the notes of one of his table companions Cod, Manh., 355, Coll. Camerar v. (Ms. Bibl. Monac.), fol. 145 a.

<sup>Cp. vol. ii., 148 f. See also "Luthern Briefwechnel," ed. C. A. H. Burkhardt, 1866, p. 357.
Cp. our vol. vi., xxxv., 3.
To Spalatin, July 26, 1522, "Briefwechnel," 3, p. 435.</sup> writings. For it must be that only a few hold fast to the Coupel [the friend and pointed out to him that many of his followers were bring trueved away by his abuse]. . Mis Highness my master has adminished one in writing, and many other friends have done the name. But my raply is ever that I neither can nor will refrain from it."

Abuse becomes almost inermulae from his teaching or at least aroun entailed by it. "Whoever accepts my teaching with a right heart," he says, "will not be acardaheed by my abuse." Indeed, he adds, emulating Hus, he was ready "to risk his life should presentation or the acade of the time demand it." Nor have we say reason to doubt that his magnified outhurisans would have rendered him capable of such a sacrifice."

In 1831 the flactor Johann sent him a remembed through Chancelor Brack on account of the two violent tracts. "Warnings an sense Leben Dearlochen," and "Auff dan vermeint keiser ich Ediet." Berger of Namey had, it appears, complianced to the kineter, that these weitings "served in no small treasure to store to retail ion, and also contained much abuse both of high and low," Bereigen Luther, with the united impudence, violented his cause to his inversign; "That crytain persons may have intorned your Electoral Baginess that the two writings were shorp and hasty, this is indeed true; I never meant them to be bount and hasty, this is indeed true; I never meant them to be bount and hast, and only regret that they were not more average and violent." for all he had much of such. "Tying blasphonesis, aminos" opponents, especially considering the diagram which the Electoral house stood, fell short of the mark; the Prince should bear in mind that he [Luther] had been." for two mild and soft in dealing with such evil knots and boughs."

first ' the knote and boughs of his liverary exponents did not consist entirely in coarse nation, but largely in the wellgrounded winds attent against his unwarranted attacks of the religion of their fathers, in which they saw the true base of the surrower week. His opponents had necessarily to take the defensive a Lather, with his furnish which and article, was in almost every over the aggresser, and investalled their writings.

It is plain that, at the very time when he thus explained his position to the flector Johann, i.e. about the time of the Diet of Augsburg, in 1530, he was under the softweece of that many power of which he had easily "I am current away I know not by what quest" ("I am not master of myself". He evclaims the first God a name and at His command I will trend upon the hon and moder and trample under four the lion and dragon (it in thus Ang 20, 1422 Works  Following 53 p. 340 ( Brockwelmi,  3, p. 44.) Up the letter to Spainter of Nov. 11, 1421,  Brockwelmi, 3, p. 246 f.

⁴ Up lettern of Nov. 11, 1517, and Fab., 1520, "Beschrechad," 1, p. 126, and 2, p. 345.

April 13, 1531, in Scidemann, "Bests, sur RG.," L. p. 207; Embers ' Latthers Briefweelsel," S. p. 388, p. 1

April 6, 1531, "Werke," Erl. ed., 54, p. 225 ("Briefwechsel," 6, p. 188) that he applies the Messianie prophecy in Ps. zc. 13], this shall commence during my lifetime and be accomplished after my dosth. St. John Hua prophesed of me, ' etc . More than ever he lays stress on the fact that he has a " Divine mission " and was "called by God to a work," not commenced "of his own pritiative"; for which cause also "God was with him and assusted him "15. He means to realise his earlier threat (1521). " If I are I shall never make peace with the Papacy ; if you life me you shad have twice so little peace. Do your worst, you swims and Thomata. Luther will be to you a bear in the road and a lien in the path [as there says]. He will meet you everywhere and not frave you in prace antil your brazen front and stiff neck be broken, either by gentleness or by force. I have hot mough patience already; if you will not amend you may continue to rage against me and I to despise you, you shandened Biomelecs. 173

He is now determined to carry out his threat of 1527 even at the cost of harlife. . 'My teaching shall cry aloud and scatte right and left , may God deny me the gifts of patience and mechanics. My ery m: No, No, No, so long as I can move a muscle, let it ves King, Emperor Princes, the devil, or whom it may . . . Bushopa, priests, monks, great Johnnies, scholars and the whole world are all thirsting for the gore of Luther, whose enecutioners they would gladly be, and the devtl blowner and his seem. . . . My seaching is the main thing by which I dely not only princes and lungs but even all the devils. I am and remain a mere sheep, . . . Not following my own concest, I may have attacked a tyreat or great scholar and given him a out and made him angry, but let him be ready for thirty more. . . . Let no one least of all the tyrante and persecutors of the Evangel, expect any patience or humility from me. . What must not my wrath be with the Papiets who are my awowed energies 1 . . . Come on, all together, since you all belong to one batch, devils, Papasta, fanation, fall upon Lather! Papers from the front, fanation from the rear, devile from every aide! Chain him, hant him down gasly, you have found the night quarry. Once Luther is down you are saved and have won the day. But I are planly that wieds are of no avail, no slune, no teaching, no exhiesation, no menaces, ne promises, no beseching serve our purpose. . . . Well, then, as God a name, let us try debance. Whoever relente, let him go, whoever is afreed, let him flee; I have at my back a strong Defender. . . . I have well served the world and brought Holy Bergsture and the Word of God to light in a way unheard of for a thousand years. I have done my part; your blood on upon your own head and not on my hands * "*

^{* &}quot;Weeke," Wester, ed., 90 2, p. 307, Eri. ed., 26*, p. 87, at the end of "Auff dus verseint Educt."

^{*} Cp shift p 384 = 84 f

^{*} Hot, W. in., ed., 12, 2, p. 168; "Opp. int. var.," 6, p. 307, in: "Contra Henricum regent Anglior," 1522.

^{*} Worke," Weirn, ed., 23, p. 27 ff., Ed. ed., 30, p. 3 ff in "Auff des Königs zu Engelland Lasterschrift," 1527.

Nevertheless, at times he appears to have had some slight qualms. Yet after having described the Papists as " Pope-Asses, slaves of the Mass, blasphemers, miscreants and murderers of souls,"1 he continues: " Should anyone here say that I confine myself to flinging coarse epithets about me and can do nothing but slander and abuse. I would reply, firstly, that such abuse is nothing compared with the unspeakable wickedness. For what is it if I abuse the devil as a murderer, miscreant, traitor, blasphemer and liar? To him all this is but a gentle breeze! But what else are the Pope-Asses but devils incarnate, who know not penance, whose hearts are hardened and who knowingly defend their palpable blasphemy. . . . Hence my abuse is not abuse at all, but just the same as were I to call a turnip a turnip, an apple an apple, or a pear a pear."18

A psychological explanation of Luther's mania for invective is also to be looked for in the admixture of vile ingredients which went to make up his abuse. So frequently had be recourse to such when in a state of excitement that they must be familiar to every observer of Luther's development and general behaviour; it is, however, our duty here to incorporate this element, so characteristic of his polemics, in our sketch of the angry Luther.

The Unpleasant Seasoning of Luther's Abuse.

The filthy expressions, to which Luther was so prone when angry, are psychologically interesting, throwing light as they do on the depth of his passion and on the all too earthly atmosphere which pervades his abuse. Luther's one object, as writer and teacher, been to vindicate spiritual treasures he would surely have seerned to make use of such adjuncts as these in his teaching or his polemics. Even when desireus of speaking foreibly, as beseemed a man of his stamp, he would have done so without introducing these disreputable and often repulsive elements of speech. He was, however, carried away by an imagination only too familiar with such vulgar imagery, and a tongue and pen much too ready to speak or write of things of that sort. Unless he places pressure on hanself a man's writings give a true picture of his inner standards, and pressure was anmething which Luther's genius could never endure

I

¹ "Werke," Wesn. ed., 30, 3, p. 311; Er., ed., 25°, p. 38, "Wernunge an semo heben Deudschon," 1531. I Ibid.

Lather had, moreover, a special motive for drawing his creations from this polluted well. He wished to arouse the lower classes and to ingratiate himself with those who, the less capable they were of thinking for themselves or of forming a true judgment, were all the readier to welcome coarseness, banter and the tone of the gutter. Amudst their densive laughter he fings his fifth in the face of his opponents, of the Catholies throughout the world, the Pope, the hierarchy and the German past,

If at Home they had to prove that the Keye had been given to St. Peter " the Pope's nether garments would fare badly." 4 Of the Papal dispensation for the clergy to marry, which many confidently expected, Luther says, that it would be just the thing for the devil . " let him open his bowels over his dispensation and sling it about his realit". The Princes and nobles (those who were on the other aids) "mailed their breaches so shamelally in the Peasant War that even now they can be emeit afar off '-He declares of the head of the Church of Rome: "Among req. Christians no one is more utterly despicable than . he stinks like a hoopee's nest  Of those generally who opposed the Divine Word he mys: "No small n worse than yours. '4 -" Good bye, beloved Rome; let what atinka go on stinking."4

" It is atuped of the Papiets to wear breeches. How if they were to get drunk and let sup a motion ?" This concern we find expressed in Lather's " Ethche Spruche wider des Concilium Obstantience" (1535). And it is quite in herping with other utterances in the same writing. He there speaks of the " dragons' heads that peep and spew out of the hind quarters of the Popu-Ass," and on the same page ventures to address our Saviour as follows: " Beloved Lord Jesus Christ, it is high time that Thou shouldst lay bere, back and front, the shame of the furious, bloodthirsty, purple-clad harridan and reveal it to the whole world in preparation for the dawn of Thy bright Coming."

Naturally he is no less present asset in his attacks on all who defended Popery. Of Ecic's ideas on chast ty he remarks: "Your he-goat to your nostrain smells like baleam "1. Of Cardinal Albert of Mayonce and his party he wrote during the Schonitz

¹ "Works," Ert. ed., 201, p. 175.

³ Had , Wester, ed., 30, 3, p. 406 , Erl. ed., 31, p. 164.

[•] Josef , Erl. ed., 41, p. 17.

¹ Josef , Wester, ed., 14, p. 460 , Erl. ed., 36, p. 81.

^{*} Josef., Erl. ed., 38, p. 176.

^{*} Had , Wesser, ed., 7, p. 7 ; Erl. ed., 53, p. 46. * Had , Fri ed. 31, p. 404. * Zhid., 16sd., Wesm. ed., 7, p. 474; Erl. ed., 27, p. 290.

controversy: These "knaves and hare" "bring out fool regalit only for devels and men to use in the closet. "The spathet, mored press, mored bashop, as several tauses applied by him to morethers of the Cathoric hierarchy." "The poor merd-press wanted to case hierarch, but, also, there was nothing in his bowels."

The Juriets who still chang to Canon Law he declares "invade the charches with their Pops like as many curing; et there is another place whither they might more ecomingly betake themselves if they wish to wipe the fundament of their Popo." * The Stalians think that "whosever a Cardinal gives vent to, however vile it be, is a new article of faith promulgated for the banets of the Germans." To the Papiets who threaten him with a Council he says: "If they are anary let them eace themselves into their breeches and sling it round their neck; that will be real baleam and pax for such this-alconed asints ""... The fauntics who opposed his teaching on the Savenment were also twitted on the score that "they would surely case themsolves on it and make use of it in the privy ". The Princes and acoundred nobles faithfully followed the devil's lead, who cannot bear to listen to God a Word "but shows at his because." How are we heat to answer an opponent, even the Pope *. As though he were a "deepwable drankard" "Give them the fig" (i.e. make a certain obscene gesture with the flat) 5. Such a bin own remedy in all hestility and every misfortune i. * I give them the fig "16. His usual counsel as, however, to turn one a "posterior " on them.

The Pope is the "fifth which the deat has dropped in the Church", he is the "devil's behop and the devil himself." — Commesting on the Papal formula "districts mandantes," he ards: "Ja, in Ara." — They want "me to run to Home and fetch forgoverous of sins. Yes, formouth, in evacuation! "

Of the Pope's Bull of encommunication he says "they ought

Of the Pope's Buil of encommunication he says "they sught to order his horred bun to be taken to the back quarters where children of Adam go to stool; it might then be used as a pocket-handkerchief. ""The We must sense hold of the "vices of the Pope and his clergy and show them up as real lockers; thus should all those who hold the office of preacher "set their droppings under the very noise of the Pope and the hancom." "The spirit of the Pope, the father of sim," wishes to display his wisdom by se

```
 Worke," Erl. ed., 22, p. 29.

* Briefe," 6, p. 373.

* Worke," Worse, ed., 30, 2, p. 485; Erl. ed., 31, p. 154

* Ibid., Erl. ed., 26', p. 149; Erl. ed., 20, p. 68.

* Ibid., Worm, ed., 10, p. 407.

* Ibid., Erl. ed., 43, p. 67.

I Ibid., Worm, ed., 10, p. 400; Erl. ed., 41, p. 20.

I Ibid., Erl. ed., 44, p. 216.

* Ibid., Worm, ed., 30, 2, p. 485; Erl. ed., 31, p. 167, 15 Ibid., Worm, ed., 30, 2, p. 485; Erl. ed., 31, p. 167, 15 Ibid., Erl., ed., 34, p. 321, altering the Word of God, that it "recks of his stale flith," -These people, who, I ke the Pope, are so learned as the Scottere, are " clevry applieds," experts in oquine anal functions. 2. They have " taken it upon thoroetem to come to the maintains of the whole world with their chastity and good works, but, is reality, they merely " stuff our mouths with home-dung.
```

" Were mich Of the alleged Papal neurrotions he excurremuck as the starred up to a free Court of, what auteoris there would but "4-The same favourste figure of accords helps here agreement the flarramentarions : "What useful purpose can be served by my raking up all the device bith fina-This phrass was at least racre at place when Luther, referring to Philip of Hear a lagarity, enid, that he I was not going to stir up the hith under the public pine 4 -After their defeat he returns to compay with the demand of the peasants, that he should support them in their lawlessness. They want us to lend them a hand in "atirring up thoroughly the fifth that is so suger to stink, tall their mouths and terms are shaked with at "1". But it is to the Pope and his followers that, by preference, he applies such amaging. "They have formitien the stool of St. Peter and St. Paus and now parade their fifth (concerning original air); to such a pass have they come that they no longer believe anything, whether concerning the Gospel, or Christ, or even this own tracking " 4 - " This is the fith they now purvey, vm. that we are mared by our works, this is the devil a own prominous tail. * Of those who awaited the decision of a Council he writes. "Let the devil west if he checees. . . . The members of the body must not wait till the fifth nave and decrees whether the body is healthy or not. We are determined to learn this from the members thermelyes and not from the unine, ear rement and fifth . In the same way we shall not wait for the Pope and bishops in Council to my: This is right. For they are no part of the body, or clean and healthy tomphore, but merely the fifth of equivolent, mere spattered on the slarve and vertable orders, for they presente the true Evergel, well knowing it to be the Word of God. Therefore we can see they are but fith, stench and strain of Satur " **

At the term of the Inct of Augsburg, in 1530, he informed the delegates of his party: "You are treating, not with men, but with the very gates of hell But they have fales foul of the wastom of find and the final wetence of this Latin quetle is in German] soil thomselves with those own filthy wastern. Amen Amon."11 The words "bescheimen" and "beschmessen" (cp. popular Prench "commerder") flow naturally from Lather s

```
I foot, Werm, ed., 30, pp. 2, 335; Erl, ed., 255, p. 52.
```

11.-1

Ibid., Erl. ed., 201, 2, p. 542. John J. B. 19.

Ideal, 25% p. 25%

F Jönd., Weins, ed., 90, p. 429; Erl, ed., 30, p. 282.

 [&]quot; Briefe," 6, p. 226.
 " Works," Weim, ed., 19, p. 43; Eri. ed., 20, p. 378. * Ibid., p. 316. Ibid., Erl. ed., 44, p. 318.

 ^{18.}d., Weim, ed. 33, p. 456., Ect. ed., 48, p. 222.
 On June 39, 1530, to Johann Agricula. "Briefwechiel." 6, p. 57.

pen. Neobulus, the Hessian defender of the bigarny, he describes so "a prince of darkness," who "has 'defiled' himself with his wisdom "; the papel 'Jacksnapes" who "declare that the Lutherans have ruce in revolt," have likewise "'defiled' themselves with their cophistry."*

He asserts he can say " with a clear conscience that the Pope in a merd-am and the foe of God." The Pope-Ass has emitted a great and horrible orders here. . . A wonder it did not tear his arms or burst his belly " "There has the Pope in his own dung." "The Popes are so fond of his and sourrilities that their paunch wases (at on them"; they are warting to see "whether the Pope's motions will not ulti-mately sears the kings.". The Papal hypocrites—I had almost said the devil's excrements—boast of being masters over the whole world."

Amidst these unavoidable quotations from Luther's unpleasant vocabulary of abuse the historian is confronted again and again with the question: What relation does this coarser side of Luther's style bear to the manners of his times? We have already pointed out how great the distance is between him and all other writers, particularly such as treat of religious subjects in a popular or polemical vem; obviously it is with the latter category of writings that his should be compared, rather than with the isolated aberrations of certain writers of romance or the lascivious works produced by the Humanists. Various quotations from contemporaries of Luther's, even from friends of the innovations, have shown that his language both astonished and shocked them.' It was felt that none other could pretend to measure himself beside this giant of invective.

Duke George of Saxony on one occasion told Luther in no kindly way that he knew peasants who spoke just the same, "particularly when the worse for drink"; indeed they went one better and "knew how to use their fists"; among them Luther would be taken for a swine-herd.

Werke," Erl. ed., 65, p. 207.

* In the regity " A if disa Schmähbuchlein," naw., "Werke," Erl. ed.,

23°, p. 143, published under Arnold's name.

Ibid., Weim, ed., 30, 3, p. 468; Erl. ed., 25°, p. 125.
 Ibid., Erl. ed., 26°, p. 216.
 Ibid., p. 216 f.
 Ibid., p. 206. Calvm also suffered, though in a less degree, from this manua for invective, of him and of the excuse some lieve sought in the tone and habits of the age a recent French historian says; Even though such abuse was not entirely imparelloled,—yet it cannot but surprise and grave us in the case of a religious reformer." H. Lemonnier, "Histoire de France," ed E. Lavisse, 5, 2, 1904, p. 230, desing with French Cabinosm.

* See our vol. A., p. 153 F.

"Their inexhaustible passion for abuse," wrote a Catholic contemporary in 1526, "makes me not a little suspicious of the teaching of this sect. No one is accounted a good pupil of Luther's who is not an adept in abusive language; Luther's own abuse knows no bounds. . . . Who can put up with such vituperation the like of which has not been heard for ages? . . . Read all this man's writings and you will hardly find a page that is not sullied with vile abuse."

It is true that the lowest classes, particularly in Saxony, as it would appear, were addicted to the use of smutty language in which they couched their resentment or their wit; this, however, was among themselves. In the writings of the Wittenberg professor of theology, on the other hand, this native failing emerges unabashed into the light of day, and the foul sayings which Luther—in his anxiety to achieve popularity—gathered from the lips of the rabble swept like a flood over the whole of the German literary field. Foul language became habitual, and, during the polemies subsequent on Luther's death, whether against the Catholics or among the members of the Protestant fold, was a favourite weapon of attack with those who admired Luther's drastic ways.

As early as 1522 Thomas Blaurer, a youthful student at Wittenberg, wrote, "No abuse, however low and shameful," must be spared until Popery is loathed by all.³ Thus the object in view was to besimirek the Papacy by pelting it with mire. When, in 1558, Tilman Heishusen, an old Wittenberg student, became Professor of Theology and General Superintendent at Heidelberg and thundered with much invective against his opponents and in favour of the Confession of Augsburg, even his friends asked the question, "whether the thousand devils he was wont to purvey from the pulpit helped to promote the pure cause of the Latheran Evangel?" At Bremen, preaching against Hardenberg, a follower of Melanchthon's, he declared, that he had turned the Cathedral into a den of murderers.³ In 1598

1, 1900, p. 68. ³ Cp. ¹⁶ KL., ¹⁷ S⁸, sol. 1956 f

Thus F. Polygramus, O.s.v., in his "Assertiones quorundam etchesta degracium," printed at Cologno in [57], Bl 10; "inscriabilis matericends libido..., a seculis manifica convectorum quese,"

To U meh Zanna, Oct. 8, 1522, "Briefweelnel der Brüder Blaurer," 1, 1908, p. 68.

Nigrinus incited the people to abuse the Papists with the words: "Up against them boldly and fan the flames so that things may be made right warm for them!" George Steinhausen remarks in this connection in his History of German Civilisation: "Luther became quite a pattern of violent abuse and set the tone for the anti-popish ranters, who, most of them, belonged to the lowest class. On their side the Catholics, for instance, Hans Salat of Lucern or the convert Johann Engerd, were also not behindhand in this respect. . . . The preachers, however, were always intent on evering them on to yet worse attacks."

The manner in which Lather in his polemics treated his opponents, wrote Döllinger in his "Sketch of Luther," "is really quite unparalleled. He never displays any of that kindly charity, which, while hating the error, seeks to win over those who err; on the contrary, with him all is abuse and anger, defiance and contemptuous scorp voiced in a tempest of invective, often of a most personal and vulgar kind. . . . It is quite wrong to say that Luther in this respect merely followed in the wake of his contemporaries; this is clear enough to everyone familiar with the literature of that age and the one which preceded it; the virulence of Luther's writings astonished everybody; those who did not owe him allegiance were not slow to express their amazement, to blame him and to emphasise the harmful effects of these outbursts of abuse, whilst his disciples and admirers were wont to appeal to Luther's 'heroic spirit' which lifted him above the common herd and, as it were, dispensed him from the observance of the moral law and allowed him to say things that would have been immoral and criminal in others."3 Especially his obscene abuse of the Pope did those of Luther's contemporaries who remained faithful to the Church brand as wicked, immoral and altogether unchristian. "What cars can listen to these words without being offended?" wrote Emser, "or who is the pious Christian who is not cut to the quick by this cruel insult and biasphenty offered to the view of Christ? Is this sort of thing Christian or Evangelical ? ""

Gesch der deutschen Kultur," p. 514,
 Lu her, eine Skirze, p. 57 f; "KL.," 81, p. 343, Wider des unaberstenne in Buch N. Lathers," ed. Enders in Neudruske deutscher Literaturwerke," vol. i., 1889, p. 132.

Protestant Opinions Old and New.

Erasmus's complaints concerning Luther's abusiveness were re-echoed, though with bated breath, by those of the new faith whose passion had not entirely earned them away. The great scholar, speaking of Luther's slanders on him and his faith, had even said that they were such as to compel a reasonable reader to come to the conclusion that he was either completely blinded by hate, or suffering from some mental malady, or else possessed by the devil. Many of Luther's own party agreed with Erasmus, at any rate when he wrote: "This unbridled abuse showered upon all, poisons the reader's mind, particularly in the case of the uneducated, and can promote only anger and dissension."

The Protestant theologians of Switzerland were much shocked. by Luther's ways. To the complaints already quoted from their letters and writings may be added the following utterances of Zwingh's successor, Heinrich Bullinger, who likewise judged Luther's offensive tone to be quite without parallel; Most of Lather's books " are cast as such a mould as to give gravous scandal to many simple folk, so that they become asspicious of the Evangelical cause as a whole. . . . His writings are for the most part nothing but invective and abuse . . . He sends to the devil all who do not at once aide with him. Thus all his tensure is imbued with hostility and contains little that is friendly. or fatherly. 'Seeing that the world already feems with abuse and curses. Bullinger thinks that it would better belit Luther " to be the milt" and to strive to mend matters, instead of which he only makes bad worse and incites his preachers to " abuse and biaspheres." "For there are far too many preachers who have sought and found in Luther's books a load of bad words. . . . From them we hear of nothing but of fanatics, rotters, Sucramentarians, foes of the Sacrament, blasphemers, securities, hyposestes, robels, dovids, heretics and endless things of the blos-. . . And this, too, is praised by many [who say] . Why, even Lather, the Prophet and Apostle of the Germans, does the BANNO I "I

Of Lather's "Schem Hamphoras" Bullinger wrote: "Were it writen, not by a famous pastor of souls, but by a swine-herd," it would still be hard to excuse * In a writing to Bucer, Bullinger also protested against endangering the Evangel by such unexampled abuse and investive. If no one could stop Lather

4 Ibed., Bt. 10.

³ "Opp.," 10, col. 1557.

Ibrd., col. 1.55: "ista tam effect a in conces maledicentra," etc.
 "Wahrhaffto Bekanntrassi ter Dieneren mu der Kilchen mit Zürzeh," Zürzeh, 1545, Bl. 130 f.

then the Papiets were right when they and of him, and the preachers who followed in his footsteps, that they were no "Evangelists, but rather scoking, foul-mouthed buffores."

In enewer to such complaints Martin Bucer wrote to Bullinger admitting the existence of gnevous shortcomings, but setting against it Luther's greatness as evinced in the admiration by ended forth. The party interests of the Evangel and his hatred of the Papal Antichrist made him to regard as merely human in Lather, frailties which to others were a clear proof of his lack of a Divine messon. As Bucer puts it: " I am willing to admit what you say of Lather's wooming discourse and writings. Oh, that I could only change his ways. . . But the follow allows himself to be carried away by the storm that riges within hims an that no one can atop him. It is God, however, Who makes use of him to proclaim His Evangel and to overthrow Antichrist. . . . He has made Luther to be so greatly respected in so many Churches that no one thinks of opposing him, still less of removing him from his position. Most people are proud of him, even those whom he does not acknowledge as los followers; many admire and copy his faults rather than his virtues, but huge indeed is the multitude of faithful who revers him as the Apostle of Christ. . . I too give him the first place in the sacred minutry. It is true there is much about him that is human, but who is there who displays nothing but what is Divine ! " In spite of all he was a great tool of God ("admirendem organism Des pro selute popula Des "); such was the ppende of all pions and learned men who really knew here *

Yet Bucer had come strong though to any to Landgrave Philip of Home, regarding Luther's addiction to abuse. To try and persuade him to deal courteously with his fore, particularly with the Zurickers after their "mutaken booklet," so Bucer writes to the Prince, "would be like trying to put out a are with oil. If Master Philip and 1—who have kept rigidly and loyally to the Concord—succeed in turning away the man's wrath from ourselves, then we shall entern numelyes backy." The "foolbardiness" of the Zurichees has "so enraged him, that even Emperers, though they should be good Evangelicals, would find it hard to pacify him." "No one has ever got the better of Dr. Luther in invective."

Fresh light is thrown on the psychological side of Luther's controversal methods when we bring together those utterances in which his sense of his own greatness finds expression. We must observe a little more closely Luther's inner thoughts and feelings from the standpoint of his own ideal.

^{*} To Burer, 1543, Lenz, "Brodwechsel Philippe," 2, p. 224. Another remark of Bullinger's is given above, vol. iii., p. 417.

^{*} To Bulling r, 1543, Lens, thid., p. 226. Cp. what Bucer and, its our vol p. p. 1.5.

On May 9, 1 (43, Leng, abid., p. 143.

4 Lather on his own Greatness and Superiority to Oriticism. The art of "Rheteris"

Characteristic utterances of Luther's regarding his own gets and excellencies, the wisdom and courage displayed in his undertaking and the important place he would occupy in history as the discoverer and proclaimer of the Evangelical truth, are to be met with in such plenty, both in his works and in the authentic notes of his conversations, that we have merely to select some of the most striking and bring them together. They form a link connecting his whole public career; he never ceased to regard all his labours from the point of view of his Divine mission, and what he says merely varies in tone and colour with the progress which took place in his work as time went on.

It is true that he knew perfectly well that it was impossible to figure a Divine in siion without the pediment and shield of humility. How indeed could those words of profound humility, so frequent with St. Paul, have rung in Luther's ears without finding some echo? Hence we find Luther, too, from time to time making such his own; and this he did, not out of mere hypocrisy, but from a real wish to identify his feelings with those of the Apostle; in almost every instance, however, his egotism destroys any good impulse and drives him in the opposite direction.

Lather's confessions of his faults and general unworthiness are often quite impressive. We may notice that such were not unfrequently made to persons of influence, to Princes and exalted patrons on whom his success depended, and whom he hoped thereby to dispose favourably; others, however, are the natural, communicative outpourings of that "colonial frankness"—as it has been termed—which posterity has to thank for its knowledge of so many of Luther's feibles. In his conversations we sometimes find him speaking slightingly of himself, for instance, when he says: "Philip is of a better brand than I. He fights and teacher: I am more of a rhotoness or govern."

A passage frequently quoted by Luther's admirers in proof of his humility is that which occurs in his preface to the "Pisater" published by Eobanus Hessia. The Pisairis, he says, had been his achool from his youth upwards. "While unwilling to put my gifts before those of others, I may yet beast with a holy presumption, that I would not, as they say, for all the thrones and language of the world, forgo the benefits, that, by the binning of the Holy Spirit, I have derived from language and meditating on the Pasiron." He was not going to hide the gifts he had specified from God, and in Him he would be proud, about in himself he found reasons enough to make him humble; he took has pleasure in his own German Pasiter than in that of Echanis, "but all to the honour and glory of God, to Whom be presse for ever and ever."

Werke," Ed. ed., 59, p. 279, Table-Talk.

In order to know Luther as he really was we should observe him amonest his pupils at Wittenberg, for instance, as he left the Schlosskirche after one of his powerful sermons to the people, and familiarly addressed those who pressed about him on the steps of the church. There were the burghers and students whose faults he had just been scourging, the theologians of his circle crowding with pride around their master; the lawyers, privy councillors and Court officials in the background, probably grumbing under their breath at Luther's peculiarities and harsh words. His friends wish him many years of health and strength that he may continue his great work in the pulpit and press; he, on the other hand, thinks only of death; he insists on speaking of his Last Will and Testament, of the chances of his cause, of his operates and of the threatened Council which he so dreaded.2

On Aug. 1, 1537, "Briefweelisel," 11, p. 255, printed in the 2nd edition of the Paulier of Hessus of 1538.-The following remark of Luther's on these who wanted to call themselves after him hat also been quoted. A Ford that you are, just fasten. First of all a beg people. to leave my name out and to call themselves, not Luthersia, but Christians. What has Luther to do with it ! The distrine is not some, nor was I ever emembed for anyone. St. Paul, I tor in [4, 5] would not near of Christians bring garled Payling or Petrais, but simply Christians. How then should I poor smells suck of maggets that I am, miller the children of Christ to be called by my unholy name? Heree, dear friend let us de away with party names and he could after Oinet. Whose teaching we follow. It is only right that the Papieta should have a party name, because they are not content with Christ's teachnig suct mane, but it said on being Popoli; let them then be the Popela. since he in their master. As for me, I neither am nor wish to se anythe a number. I share with the weign , attending the tree ing of threat Who alone is our Master. Bit xxiii. [8]." "Werke," We'ri et . 3, p. 665., Ert. ed., 22, p. 56 f., "Vormanung sich zu vorlitten für Arthruhr," 1522. He blames those who, by their stopid seal, "cause calumny and a fixing away from the body Expreed and affright "the people and prevent their accepting it. Just then it was to like interest to represent its teaching as peacestim and his action as moderates. Cp. pp. 677, GB2 f == 44, 51 53.

We have chosen this somewhat innural setting for the following reduction of Luther a settings in order to previous theorems. The texts, mileed, belong to various times, but there are periods in Lather's lastory, for instance, about the time of the last of Angeburg, and an

"Let me be," Luther cries, turning to the lawyers, " even in my Last Will, the man I really am, one well known both in heaven and on earth, and not unknown in hell, standing in sufficient esteem and authority to be trusted and behaved in more than any notary; for God, the Father of Mercies. has entrusted to me, poor, unworthy, wretched sinner that I am, the Gospel of His Dear Son and has made and hithertokept me faithful and true to it, so that many in the world have accepted it through me, and consider me a teacher of the truth in spite of the Pope's ban and the wrath of Emperors, Kings, Princes, priests and all the devis. . . . Dr. Martin Luther, God's own notary and the witness of His Gospel."1

I am "Our Lord Jesus Christ's unworthy evangelist."

I am "the Prophet of the Germans, for such is the haughty title I must henceforth assume."

"I am Ecclesiastes by the Grace of God"; "Evangelist

by the Grace of God."4

"I must not deny the gifts of Jesus Christ, viz. that, however small be my acquaintance with Holy Scripture, I understand it a great deal better than the Pope and all his people." h

"I believe that we are the last trump that sounds before

Christ's coming. 174

Many arise against me, but with " a breath of my mouth " I blow them over. All their prints are mere "autumn ea.vea.227

"One only of my opponents, viz. Latomus, is worth his salt, he is the sembe who writes best against me. Latomus alone has really written against Luther, make a note of that I All the others, like Erasmus, were but frogs. Not one of them really meant it seriously. Yes indeed all, Erasmus included, were just croaking frogs."8 1540 and 1541, when, within a short chronological space, he contrived to make a vast number of statements regarding his greatness; for this reason, the above arrangement is not altogether untrue to the reality.

Werke, Erl. ed., 56, p. 2, and "Briefe," ed. De Wette, 5, p. 422. Words taken from his Will of Jan. 6, 1542, by which he intended to show the lawyers (who questioned his power to make a valid Will on account of his marriage) that he was not bound by the formanties on which they insuted.

* "Werke," Weim ed., 30, 3, p. 366; Ed. ed., 25*, p. 75.

I have been tried in the school of temptations; "these are the exalted temptations which no Pope has ever understood," I mean, "being tempted to blasphemy and to question God's Judgments when we know nothing either of sin or of the remedy."

Because I have destroyed the devil's kingdom "many say I was the man foretold by the Prophet of Lichtenberg, for in their opinion I must be he. This was a prophecy of the devil, who well saw that the kingdom he had founded on lies must fall. Hence he beheld a monk, though he could not tell to which Order he belonged."

"Be assured of this, that no one will give you a Doctor of Holy Scripture save only the Holy Ghost who is in heaven. . . . He indeed testified aforetimes against the prophet by the mouth of the abe-ass on which the prophet rode. Would to God we were worthy to have such doctors sent us!"

"I have become a great Doctor, this I am justified in saying; I would not have thought this possible in the days of my temptations" when Staupitz comforted me with the assurance, "that God would make use of me as His assistant in mighty things."

"St. John Hus" was not alone in prophesying of me that . . . "they will perforce have to listen to the singing of a swan," but likewise the prophet at Rome foreteld "the coming hermit who would lay waste the Papacy."

When I was a young monk and lay sick at Erfurt they said to me: "Be consoled, good bachelor...our God will still make a great man of you. This has been fulfilled."

"On one occasion when I was consoling a man on the loss of his son he, too, said to me: "You will see, Martin, you will become a great man!" I often call this to mind, for such words have something of the omen or oracle about them."

"Small and insignificant as they [Luther's and the preachers' reforms] are, they have done more good in the

Go gle

3 Amelwechsel, 8, p. 160.

Ibid., p. 73.
 Lauterbuch, "Tegebuch," p. 143. Cp. "Colloq.," ed. Bindseil, 1.

p. 442. See above, vos. nr., p. 165 f.

* "Werke" Westn ed., 6, p. 460; Erl ed., 21, p. 349. "An den christ! Adel," 1520.

 ^{* &}quot;Briefwechsel," 8, p. 159
 * "Worke" Worm, ed., 30, 3, p. 387; Erl. ed., 257, p. 87. See above, vol. 111, p. 165.
 * Mathesius, "Historien," p. 4.

Churches than all the Popes and lawyers with all their decrees."1

"No one has expounded St. Paul better" than you, Philip (Melanchthon). "The commentaries of St. Jerome and Origen are the merest trash in comparison with your annotations " (on Romans and Corinthians). " Be humble if you like, but at least let me be proud of you." "Be content that you come so near to St. Paul himself."3

" In Popery such darkness prevailed that they taught neither the Ten Commandments, nor the Creed, nor the Our Father: such knowledge was considered quite superfluous.123

"The blindness was excessive, and unless those days had been shortened we should all have grown into beasts ! I fear, however, that after us it will be still worse, owing to the dreadful contempt for the Word."4

" Before my day nothing was known," not even "what parents or children were, or what wife or maid."*

"Such was then the state of things: No one taught, or had heard or knew what secular authority was, whence it came, or what its office and task was, or how it must serve God "-" But I wrote so usefully and splendidly concerning the secular authorities as no teacher has ever done since Apostolic times, save perhaps St. Augustine; of this I may boast with a good conscience, relying on the testimony of the whole world."

Similarly, "we could prove before the whole world that we have preached much more grandly and powerfully of good works than those very people who abuse us,"T

" Not one of the Fathers ever wrote anything remarkable or particularly good concerning matrimony. . . . In marriage they saw only evil luxury. . . . They fell into the ocean of sensuality and evil lusts." "But (by my preachingl God with His Word and by His peculiar Grace has restored, before the Last Pay, matrimony, secular authority and the preaching office to their rightful position, as He

¹ Ibid., 36, p. 447=18⁴, p. 334. Sermon of 1532

<sup>Briefe," ed. De Wette, 5, p. 716.
Werke, 'Weim ed. H. 2 p 309 f; "Opp lat var." 7, p. 491;
Briefe," 2, p. 239 ('Briefewechiel," 3, p. 438).
Lauter sich, 'Tagebuel," p. 151. * Ibid., p. 193.
Wecke, 'Weim ed. 30, 3, p. 317; Erl ed., 252 p. 46 f.
Ibid., 30, 2, p. 109 f. 31, p. 34 f. "Vem Kriege widder die Türcken," 1529.</sup> instituted and ordained them, in order that we might behold His own institutions in what hitherto had been but sharps."1

The Papists "know nothing about Holy Scripture, or what God is . . . or what Baptism or the Sacrament." But thanks to me. " we now have the Gospel almost as pure and undefiled as the Apostles had it."*

"Not for a thousand years has God bestowed such great gifts on any bishop as He has on me; for it is our duty to extol God's gifts."4

It is easy to understand what an impression such assurances and such appeals to the heavenly origin of his gifts must have made on enthusiastic pupils. Before abowing the speaker to continue we may perhaps set on record what one of his defenders alleges in Luther's favour * " An energetic character to whom all protonce is hateful may sure y speak quite freely and openly of his own merits and capatabless." "Why asould such a thing seem strange? Because now, among well bred people, conventions demand that, even should we be conscious of good deeds and qualities in currelyes, we should nevertheless speak as though unaware of them." Luther, however, was "certain that he had found the centre of all truth, and that he processed it as his very own; he knew that by his "faith "he had become something, via that which every man ought to become according to the will of God. This explains that self reliance whereby he felt himself raised above those who either continued to withstand the truth, or ewe had not yet discovered it. By such uttermices he " only wasted to explain why he feared nothing for his cause " "Arrogance and a lf-concept are said il but he who by God's grace really is asmething must feel proud and self-reliant." The only question is whether it is a proof of pride that he was not altogether oblivious of this, and this he himself occasionally moke of st. 7 . 4 Christ and Paul knew what they were and openly proclaimed it. Just as Christ found Hissielf accused of arrogance, so Paul, too, felt that his beasting would be mu-understood." Heades, "Lather, because the title prophet [which he had applied to himself] was open to misconstruction, writes elsewhere: "I do not say that I am a prophet." "

Ibad., Erl. ed., 61, p. 178, Table-Talk
Cp. vol. in p. 131 f., and above, p. 102.
Werke, Weim ed., 15, p. 39, Erl. ed., 22, p. 184.
Ibad. Erl. ed., 61 p. 422
W. Walther, "Far Luther wider Rom," pp. 526-541.

Other Protestant writers are of a different opinion. Friedrich Paulsen says in his " Gesch, des Unterrichts;" 12, 1896, p. 178 : " 14 is certain that humility towards mea, respect for human wastern and but our down, slot not enter into Lither a make. He in altogether through in that harming towards the actual Church which in no contacteristic of St. Augustine, Lat wire great predictioner in theology.

The comparison between Christ's sayings and Luther's had best be quietly dropped. As to the parallel with the Aportle of the Contiles-his so-called boasting (2 Cor. xi. 16, xii, 1 ff.) and his frequent and humble admissions of frainty—St. Paul certainly has no need to fear companion with Luther. He could have set before the world other proofs of his Divine mission, and yet he preferred to make the most humble confessions .

"But for raysesf I will glory in nothing but in my infirmities," says Paul . . . "gladly therefore will I glory in my infirmities that the power of Christ may dwell in me; for which cause I please myself in my infirmatics, in reproaches, necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ. For when I am weak then am I powerful . . . although I be nothing, yet the signs of my apostleship have been wrought in you in all patience, in signs and wonders and mighty deeds." "For I am the least of the Apostles, who am not worthy to be called an Apostle because I persecuted the Church of God. But by the grace of God I am what I am and His grace hath not been void, but I have laboured more abundant y than they all. yet not I but the grace of God with me." "But we became little ones in the midst of you, as if a nurse should cherish her children: so desirous of you, we would gladly impart unto you not only the Gospel of God but also our own souls because you were become most dear to us. . . . You are our glory and yoy' (2 Cor. xii. 5 ff.; 1 Cor. xv. 9; 1 These. ii. 7 ff).

"God has appointed me for the whole of the German land," Luther continues, "and I boldly youch and declare that when you obey me in this [the founding of Evangelical schools) you are without a doubt obeying not me but Christ, and that, whoever obeys me not, despises, not me, but Christ [Luke xx, 16] For I know well and am certain of what and whereto I speak and teach."

" And now, dear Germans, I have told you enough; you have heard your prophet; God grant we may obey His words.

As Germany does not obey "misery" must needs overtake it; "when I pray for my beloved Germany I feel that my prayer recoils on me and will not ascend upwards as it does when I pray for other things. . . . God grant that I be wrong and a false prophet in this matter."3

The more Luther, during the course of his life, passes from the position. of a more because to that of hand of a new Church, the more does that formula [My cause is God's owr] become tinged with bitterness, with obstansey and with pride "

Works, Weim, ed., 15, p. 27 f.; Erl ed., 22, p. 171. "An the Radherra," etc., 1524

* Ibid., 30, 2. p. 588 | 174, p. 421. "Descens: Kinder zur Schulen halton solle," 1530, Ibid., p. 515 f. = 420.

"Our Lord God had to summon Moses six times, me, too, He has led in the same way. . . . Others who lived before me attacked the wicked and scandalous life of the Pope; but I assaued his very doctrine and stormed in upon the monkery and the Mass, on which two pillars the whole Papacy rests. I could never have foreseen that these two pullars would fall, for it was almost like declaring war on God and all creation. 111

"I picked the first fruits of the knowledge and faith of Christ, viz. that we are justified by faith in Christ and not by works." 1

" I am he to whom God first revealed it."

"Show me a single passage on justification by faith in the Decrees, Decretals, Clementines, "Liber Sertus" or " Extravagantes," in any of the Summas, books of Sentences. monkish sermons, synodal definitions, collegial or monastic Rules, in any Postils, in any work of Jerome and Gregory, in any decisions of the Councils, in any disputations of the theologians, in any lectures of any University, in any Mass. or Vigil of any Church, in any "Caremoniale Episcoporum," in the institutes of any monastery, in any manual of any confraternity or guild, in any pilgnms' book anywhere, in the prous exercises of any Saint, in any Indulgence, Bull, anywhere in the Papal Chancery of the Roman Curia of inthe Curia of any bishop. And yet it was there that the doctrine of faith should have been expressed in all its fulness."4

" My Evangel," that was what was wanting. "I have, praise be to God, achieved more reformation by my Evangel than they probably would have done even by five Councils. . . . Here comes our Evangel . . . and works wonders, which they themselves accept and make use of, but which they could not have secured by any Councils." 6

"I believe I have summoned such a Council and effected such a reformation as will make the ears of the Papists tingle and their heart burst with makes. . . . In biref: It is Luther's own Reformation." •

 Ibid., 62, p. 443 f., Table-Talk.
 "Opp. lat. var.," 1, p. 20. Preface to the edition of the Latin. works (1545).

Werke," Weim, ed., 10, 3, p. 8; Ed. ed., 28, p. 213. " Werke," Ert. ed., 61, p. 445 f., Table-Tells (in Latin).

1 Ibid., 31, p. 389 f. "Ein Brieff von seinem Buch der Winckelmessen, " 1534. * Ibid., 63, pp. 271, 274, Table-Talk,

" I, who am nothing, may say with truth that during the [twenty] years that I have served my dear Lord Christ in the preaching office, I have had more than twenty factions opposing me "; but now they are, some of them, extrepated, others, "like worms with their heads trodden off,"1

"I have now become a wonderful monk, who, by God's grace, has deposed the Roman devil, viz. the Pope; yet not I, but God through me, His poor, weak instrument; no emperor or potentate could have done that."2

In point of fact "the devil is not angry with me without good reason, for I have rent his kingdom asunder. What not one of the kings and princes was able to do, that God has effected, through rue, a poor beggar and lonely monk."

How poor are the ancient Fathers in comparison! "Chrysostom was a mere gossip. Jerome, the good Father, and lauder of nuns, understood pregious little of Christianity. Ambrose has indeed some good sayings. If Peter Lombard had only happened upon the Bible he would have excelled all the Eathers."4

"See what darkness prevailed among the Fathers of the Church concerning faith! Once the article concerning justification was obscured it became impossible to stem the course of error. St. Jerome writes on Matthew, on Galatians and on Titus, but how partry it all is! Ambrose wrote ax books on Genesis, but what poor stuff they are! Augustine never writes powerfully on faith except when assailing the Pelaguans . . . They left not a single commentary on Romans and Galatians that is worth anything. Oh, how great, on the other hand, is our age in purity of doctrine, and yet, alas, we despise it! The holy Fathers taught better than they wrote; we, God be praised, write better than we live." Had Gregory the Great at least refrained from spoiling what remained! "He broke in with his pestilent traditions, bound men down to observances concerning flesh-meat, cowls and Masses, and imposed on them his filthy, merdiferous law. And in the event this dreadful state of things grew from day to day worse."*

"On the other hand, it is plain that I may venture to Preface to his Commentary on Galatians, Irmischer, 1, p. 9.

Werke," Erl. ed., 58 p. 243.
Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 141.
Matheaum, "Hatomen." p. 153.
Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 123.

boast in God, without arrogance or untrith, that, when it comes to the writing of books I am not far behind many of the Fathers."¹²

"In short the fault lay in thu, that [before I came], even in the Universities the Bible was not read; when it was read at all it had to be interpreted in accordance with Aristotle. What blindness that was!"

But then my translation of Holy Scripture appeared. Whereas the Schoolmen never were acquainted with Scripture, indeed "never were at home even in the Catechism," all admit my Bible scholarship. On one occasion "Carlstadt said to the Doctors at Wittenberg: My dear sirs, Dr. Martin is far too learned for us; he read the Bible ten years ago and now if we read it for ten years, he will then have read it for twenty; in any case, therefore, we are lost." "Don't start disputing with him."

"Nevertheless I never should have attained to the great abundance of Divine gifts, which I am forced to confess and admit, unless Satur had tried me with temptations; without these temptations pride would have east me into the abyss of hell."*

"The Papists are blind to the clear light of truth because it was revealed by a man. As though Elias, who wrought such great things against the servants of Baal, was not likewise a man and a beggir. As though John the Baptist, who so brilliantly put to flight the Pharisees, was not a man too. One's being a man does not matter provided one be a man of God. For heroes are not merely men."

Cortain statements of contemporaries, both Catholica and Protestants, sound like interpetions in the midst of Luther's discourse. They point out how inheard of was his domand that feath should be preced in him alone to the exclusion of all Christian authorities post and present. "What unevempled pride in this," exclain at the learned Ulrich Zasius, who an earlier days had favoured Ligher's more moderate plans of reform, "when a man demands that his interpretation of the Bible should be given precedure over that of the Fothers of the Church herself, and of the whole of Christondom !"?" He has stuck himself in the

3. "Weeks," Erl. ed., 60, p. 403, Preface, 1539.

^{*} Schlagermanf n. "An zeichtungen," p. 121 * Dod., rein Veit Detrich i. "Au zeichmungen." * Did., p. 41

<sup>Lamerbach, 'Tagebreh, p. 123.
Ta Ambrea, B care, 18e, 21, 1521. "Briefwechsel der Brider Bhorer." I. p. 42 ft. R. Stratzeng, 'U.F. Zasaus, 1857, p. 231, Op. p. 371.</sup>

Pope's place," cries Thomas Münzer, and does the grand as though, forsooth, he had not come into the world in the ordinary way, but "had aprung from the brain." "Make yourself coey in the Papel chair," is Valentine Ickelsamer's comment, since you are determined to "laten only to your own song."

Luther concludes his address to his followers by replying first of all to the frequent objection we have just heard Zasius bring forward:

"I, Dr. Martin Luther by name, have taken it upon me to prove for further instruction each and every article in a well-grounded work. . . . But first I must answer certain imputations made by some against me." "They twit me with coming forward all alone and seeking to teach everybody. To this I reply that I have never put myself forward and would have been glad to creep into a corner; they it is who dragged me out by force and cunning."

"But who knows whether God has not raised me up and called me to this, and whether they have not cause to fear that they are contemning God in me? Do we not read in the Old Testament that God, as a rule, raised up only one prophet at a time? Moses was alone when he led the people out of Egypt; Helias was alone in the time of King Achab; later on Helisaus was also alone; Isaus was alone in Jerusalem, Oseas in Israel, Hieremias in Judea, Ezechiel in Babylon, and so on."

"The dear Saints have always had to preach against and reprove the great ones, the kings, princes, priests and scholars."

"I do not say that I am a prophet, but I do say that the Papists have the more reason to fear I am one, the more they despise me and esteem themselves. God is wonderful in His works and judgments. . . . If I am not a prophet yet I am certain within myself that the Word of God is with me and not with them; for I have Scripture on my side, but they, only their own doctrine."

"There were plenty donkeys in the world in Balaam's time, yet God did not speak through all of them, but only through Balaam's ass." "They also say that I bring forward new things, and that it is not to be supposed that ^{* &}quot;Werke," Welm. ed., 7, p. 510 f.; Erl. ed., 24*, p. 57. "Grund und Ureach aller Artickel." 1521. * Ibid., p. 311 = 58. * Ibid., p. 313=59. * Ibid.

² Münzer and Ickelsamer in our vol. H., p. 377.

all others were in the wrong for so long. To this reproof the ancient prophets also had to listen. . . . Christ's teaching was different from what the Jews had heard for a thousand years. On the strength of this objection the heathen, too, might well have despised the Apostles, seeing that their ancestors had believed otherwise for more than three thousand years."1

"I say that all Christian truth had perished amongst those who ought to have been its upholders, viz. the bishops and learned men. Yet I do not doubt that the truth has survived in some hearts, even though only in those of babes in the cradle."

" I do not reject them fall the Doctors of the Church] . . . but I refuse to believe them except in so far as they prove their contentions from that Scripture which has never erred. . . . Necessity forces us to test every Doctor's writings by the Bible and to judge and decide upon them. The standing as well as the number of my focs is to me a proof that I am in the right."

"Were I opposed only by a few insignificant men I should know that what I wrote and taught was not from God. . . . Truth has ever caused disturbance, and false teachers have ever cried 'Peace, peace,' "4

"They say they don't want to be reformed by such a beggar. . . . " " Daniel has arisen in his place and is determined to perform what the angel Gabriel has pointed out to him: for the same prophet told us how he would rise up at the end of the world. That he is now doing." "God has made Luther a Samson over them; He is God and His ways are wonderful. . . . Let good people say the best they can of me and let the Papists talk and lie to their hearts' content."*

Neither councils nor reformations will help them. "They wish to reform and govern the Church according to their own lights and by human wisdom; but that is something that hes far above the counsel of men. When our Lord God wished to reform His Church He did so 'demitter,' not by human methods; thus it was at the time of Josue, of the Judges, Samuel, the Apostics and also in my own time. 114

Google

^{*} Hold. p. 317 = 61 f. * Werke, Lett. ed., 31, p. 389 f. Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 186

Even should our work be frustrated, yet the "power of the Almighty could make a new Luther out of nothing." In this wise "God raised up Noe when He was obliged to destroy the world by the deluge. And, in Abraham's time, when the whole world was plunged in darkness and under the empire of Satan, Abraham and his seed came as a great light; and He drowned King Pharao and slew seven great nations in Canaan. And again when Caiphas crucified the Son of God . . . He rose again from the dead and Caiphas was brought to nought."

"Christ was not so greatly considered, nor had He ever such a number of hearers as the Apostles had and we now have; Christ Himself said to His disciples: 'You will do greater works than I,' and, truly enough, at the time of the Apostles, and now amongst us, the Gospel and the Divine Word is preached much more powerfully and is more widely spread than at the time of Christ."2

It is true that "my conviction is, that, for a thousand years, the world has never loathed anyone so much as me. I return its hatred."*

It "is probable that my name stinks in the nostrils of many who wish to belong to us, but you [Bugenhagen] will put things right without my troubling." Formerly the decisions of the Councils ranked above God's Word, "but now, thank God, this would not be believed among us even by ducks or geese, mice or lice." "God has no liking for the 'expectants' [those who looked for a Council], for He will have His Word honoured above all angels, let alone men or Councils, and will have no waiting or expectancy. Our best plan will be to send them to the devil in the abyes of hell, to do their waiting there."4

" So the Council is going to be held at Trent. Tridentum. however, signifies in German, 'divided, torn asunder, dissolved,' for God will scatter it and its Legates. I believe they do not know what they are doing or what they mean to do. God has cursed them with blindness." * "Nay, under Satan's rule they have all gone mad; they condemn us and then want our approval." " The Council is worthy of its monsters. May misfortune fall upon them; the wrath

Briefe, 6 8, p. 402.
 Weeke, Erl, ed., 57, p. 94.

Mathemas, "Aufactehnungen," p. 113.

1 "Briefe," 5, p. 418 f. | Ibid., p. 743. * Ibid., p. 748.

of God is verily at their heels." "They look upon us as donkeys, and yet do not realise their own dense stupidity and malice."

"Should we fall, then Christ will fall with us, the ruler of the world. Granted, however, that He is to fall, I would rather fall with Christ than stand with the Emperor." "Put your trust in your Emperor and we will put our trust in ours [in Christ], and wait and see who holds the field. Let them do their best, they have not yet got their way." They shall perish. "I fear they wish to hear those words of Julius Cresar: "They themselves have willed it!""

Should I be carried to the grave, for instance, as a victim of the religious war, people will say at the sight of the Popish rout that will ensue: "Dr. Martin was escorted to his grave by a great procession. For he was a great Doctor, above all bishops, monks and parsons, therefore it was fitting that they should all follow him into the grave, and furnish a subject for talk and song. And to end up, we shall all make a little pilgrimage together; they, the Papists, to the bottomless pit to their god of lying and murder, whom they have served with hes and murders; I to my Lord, Jesus Christ, Whom I have served in truth and peace; . . . they to hell in the name of all the devils, I to heaven in God's name."

No mortal ever spoke of himself as Luther did. He reveals himself as a man immeasurably different from that insipid portrait which depicts him as one who made no claim on people's submission to his higher light and higher authority, but who humbly advanced what he fancied he had discovered, an ordinary human being, even though a great one, who was only at pains to convince others by the usual means in all wisdom and charity. Everyday psychology does not avail to explain the language Luther used, and we are faced by the graver question of the actual condition of such a mind, raised so far above the normal level. "We have," says Adolf Harnack, "to choose between two alternatives; Either he suffered from the

Ibid., p. 750.
 To Meinrehthon, June 30, 1530, "Briefwechael," 8, p. 51 f., during the Diet of Augsburg.
 Werke," Weim, ed., 30, 3, p. 279; Erl. ed., 25°, p. 8.

mania of greatness, or his self-reliance really corresponded with his task and achievements."

Luther, at the very commencement of the tract which he published soon after leaving the Wartburg, and in which he describes himself as " Eccuriastes by the grace of God," says. "Should you, dear Sirs, look upon me as a fool for my assumption of so haughty a title," I should not be in the least surprised; he adds, however: "I am convinced of this, that Christ Himself, Who is the Master of my teaching, calls me thus and regards me as such ", his " Word, office and work "had come to him "from God," and his "judgment was God's own " no less than his doctrine." The bishops of the Catholic world may well have rused their evel-rows at the tone of this work, couched in the form of a Bull and addressed to all the "Popish bishops"; the following year it was even reprinted in Latin at Wittenberg in order to make it known throughout the world. Bossuet's words on the opening lines of the tract well reader the feeling of apprehension they must have created; "Hence Luther's is the same call as St. Paul's, no less direct and no less extraordmary ! . . . And on the strength of this Divine mission Luther proceeds to reform the Church I " We should, however, note that Luther, in his extraordinary demands, goes far beyond any mere claim to a Divine call. A heavenly vocation might perfectly well have been present without any such haughty treading under foot of the past, without any such concert as to his own and his fellowworkers' achievements, and without all this boosting of prophecies, of victories over fanatics and devils, and of world wide fame, rather, a true vocation would dread any thing of the kind. Hence, in the whole series of statements we have quoted commencing with the title of Egglesiastes by the Grace of God, which he adopted soon after his Wart-Bournet, * Blot. des variations," Pans ed., 1702, I, p. 28.

¹ "Theol Literaturating," 1911, No. 10, sol. 304. Hernack adds: "Towards God he remained humble; this humbley was, however, concluded in a language which must have affrighted the monked devoters."

⁹ "Wyder den falich genentten Standt des Rapet und der Riechesfen," with the sub-trile: "Martin Luther, by God's grace Ecolometes at Wittenberg, to the Popula Bashops my vert so and to them knowledge in Christ." "Werke," Weim. ed., 10, 2, p. 105 ff.; Erl. ed., 20, p. 142 ff. The book was partly written at the Warthing (see Introd in the Weim ed., 10, 2, p. 93 f.), and was published in 1522, probably in Aug.

burg "baptism," we find not only the consciousness of a mission conferred on him at the Wartburg, but also an altogether unique idea of his own greatness which no one who wishes to study Luther's character must lose sight of. We shall have, later on, to ask ourselves whether those were in the right who looked upon this manifestation as a sign of disease.

Luther's language would be even more puzzling were it not certain that much that he said was not really meant seriously. With him rhetoric plays a greater rule than is commonly admitted, and even some of his utterances regarding his own greatness are clearly flowers of rhetoric written half in jest.

Luther himself ingenuously called his art of abusing all opponents with the utmost vigour, " thefories mea." This he did in those difficult days when it was a question of finding some means of escape in connection with the threatening Diet of Augsburg: "By my rhetoric I will show the Papists that they, who pretend to be the champions of the faith and the Gospel, have there [at Augsburg] made demands of us which are contrary to the Gospel: verily I shall fall upon them tooth and nail. . . . Come, Luther most certainly will, and with great pomp set free the eagle (the Evangel) now held caught in the snare ('acution liberaturus magnifice ')." So much did he trust his rhetorical talent that on another occasion he told the lawyers: "If I have painted you white, then I can equally well paint you black again and make you look like regular devils." Amidst the embarrassments subsequent on Landgrave Philip's bigamy Luther's one ray of hope was in his consciousness, that he could easily manage to "extricate" himself with the help of his pen; at the same time, when confiding this to the Landgrave, he also told him quite openly, that, should be, the Landgrave, "start a literary feud" with him, Luther would soon "leave him sticking in the mud."

We have already heard him say plainly: "I have more in me of the rhetorician or the gossip"; he adds that his only writings which were strictly doctrinal were his commentaries on Gaistians.

¹ To Spaintin, Aug. 28, 1530, "Briefwechsel," 2, p. 232.

Worke," Erl. ed., 26, p. 275.

Above, p. 58.
Above, p. 327.

and on Deuteronomy and his sermons on four chapters of the Gospel of St. John; all the rost the printers engit web pass over, for they merely traced the history of his conflict; the truth bring that his doctrine "had not been so clear at first as it is now." And yet he had formerly written much on doctrine; as he once end in a conversation recorded in Schlagisticules a notice of 1832; "I don't care for my Pusiter, it is long and garrulous. Formerly I was so cloquent that I wanted to take the whole world to doath. Now I can do this no longer, for the thoughts won't come. Once upon a time I could take more about a little flower than I now could shout a whole mendew. I am not fond of any superfluity of words. Johns replied: The Positer [you wrote] is, however, of the Body Chest and please me well."

That he avoided "any superfluity of words ' later in afe is not apparent. What he says of immed in the Table-Talk, wit that he resembled an italian in avelment and wealth of language, holds good of him equally at a later date; on the other hand, his remark, that Erminus purveyed "words without content" and he content without words, " is not true of the facts.

An example of his rhetorical shiftly to entarge upon a thought in found in the continuation of the sentence already mentioned (p. 331); "Before my day nothing was known."

"Formerly no one knew what the Gospel was, what Christ, or baptions, or confession, or the flaresment was, what faith, what spirit, what firsh, what good warm, the Ten Commandments, the Cur Father, prayer, outlering, commission, secular authority, materiality, parents of children were, what treater, prevent, unfr, maid, devils, angels, world, his, death, sin, low forgiverent, tied, biologi, paster, or Charch was, or what was a Christian, or what the cross , in fine, we know asthing whatever of all a Clinetian night to know. Everything was hidden and overherns by the Pope Ass. For they are donkeys, great, rade, unlettered donkeys in Christian things . . . But now thank God, things are better and male and female years and old, know the Cateshiam. . . . The things mentioned above have again emerged into the light." The Popule, however, "will not suffer any one of these things, . . . You must bein us [so they say] to provent enyone from from ng the Ten Commandmenta, the thir Pather and Creed; or about baptions, the bacrament, faith, authority, materiousy or the Coupel . . . You must lead us a hand so that in place of marriage, Christendors may again be filled unto formentoes, induftery and other unnatural and shameful visco," 5

A particular quality of Luther's "rhetoric" was its exaggeration. By his exaggeration his controversy becomes a strangely glaring picture of his mind; nor was it merely in controversy that his boundless exaggeration shows itself.

^{*} P. 28. Cp. Lauterbach, "Tagebuch" (Khummer), p. 141; Cordatus, "Tagebuch," p. 118.

^{*} Worte, Lei, ed., 62, p. 346 f. Hathreim, "Tuchreden," p. 90

⁶ "Werke," Weim, ed., 30, 2, p. 317 ff ; Erl. ed., 25°, p. 46 f., in the "Warmings on some lieben Deutschen," 1530.

Sometimes, apparently, without his being aware of it, but likewise even in the course of his literary labours and his preaching, things had a tendency to assume gigantic proportions and fantastic shapes in his eyes. Among his friends the aberrations into which his fondness for vigorous and far-fetched language led him were well known. It was certain of his own followers who dubbed him "Doctor Hyperbolicus" and declared that "he made a carnel of a fiea, and said a thousand when he meant less than five." This is related by the Lutheran zealot, Cyrineux Spangenberg, who dutifully seeks to refute the "many, who, though disciples of his," were in the habit of making such complaints.

His "rhetoric," in spite of a literary style in many respects excellent, occasionally becomes grotesque and insipid owing to the utter want of taste he shows in his choice of expressions. This was particularly the case in his old age, when he no longer had at his command the figures of speech in which to clothe decently those all too vigorous words to which, as the years went by, he became more and more addicted. In the last year of his life, for instance, writing to his Elector and the Bessian Landgrave concerning the "Defensive league" of those who stood up for "the old religion," he says: God Himself has intervened to oppose this league, not being unaware of its aims; "God and all His angels must indeed have had a terrible cold in the head not to have been able to smell, even until this 21st day of October, the savoury dish that goes by the name of Defensive league; but then He took some sneezewort and cleared His brain and gave them to understand pretty plainty that His catarrh was gone and that He now knew very well what Defensive league was."2 Luther does not seem to feel how much out of place such buffoonery was in a theologian, let alone in the founder of a new religion. Even in some of his earlier writings and in those which he prized the most, e.g. in the Commentary on Galatians, a amilar want of taste is noticeable. It is also unnecessary to repeat that even his " best " writings, among them the work on Galatians, are frequently rendered highly unpalatable by an excess of uscless repetitions. Everybody can see that the monotony of Luther's works is chiefly due to the haste and carelessness with which they were written and then rushed through the press.

³ Spangeaberg, ⁴ Thear der Lutherm, Von des werthen Gotten Mannes Loctor Martin Luther 21 Predigten ²² (presched after 1562), Ursel, a. a. Bi, 12².

Letter written after Oct. 24, 1545. "Briefe." 6, p. 392.

In considering Luther's "rhetoric," however, our attention perforce wanders from the form to the matter, for Luther based his claim to originality on his art of bringing forward striking and effective thoughts and thus charming and captivating the reader. In his thoughts the same glaring, grotesque and contradictory element is apparent as in his literary style and outward conduct. Much is mere impressionism, useful indeed for his present purposes, but contradicted or modified by statements chewhere. Whatever comes to his pen must needs be put on paper and worked for all it is worth. Thus in many instances his thoughts stray into the region of paradox. Thereby he seemed indeed to be rendering easier the task of opponents who wished to refute him, but as a matter of fact he only increased the difficulty of dealing with him owing to his elusiveness.

Even down to the present day the ineautious reader or historian is all too frequently exposed to the temptation of taking Luther at his word in passages where in point of fact his thoughts are the plaything of his "rhetoric." Anybody seeking to portray Luther's train of thought is liable to be confronted with passages, whether from the same writing or from another composed under different influences, where statements to an entirely different effect occur. Hence, when attempting to describe his views, it is essential to lay stress only on statements that are clear, devoid of any hyperbolical vesture and frequently resterated.

He was not, of course, serious and meant to introduce no new rule for the interpretation of Scripture when he pronounced the words so often brought up against him (" inc cole, sic subso") in connection with his interpolation of the term " alone " in Rom, is. 28.," yet this centence occupies such a position in a famous passage of his works that it will repay us to give it with its context as a typical instance:

"If your Papist insuts on making much needless ado about the word "alone," tell him smart y: Dr. Martin Luther will have it so and says: Papist and denkey is one and the same.

^{2 &}quot; For we account a men to be justified by faith elone without the works of the law". Op. vol. v., xxxiv. 3.

"Sie volo, sie tubes; sit pre sutions soluntes." For we will not be the l'apusts pupils er disciples, but their masters and judges, and, for ence in a way, we shall strut, and rap these news heads; and as Paul beasted to his crasy earsts, so I ton will brank to these my donkeys. They are Doctors? So am I. They are beared? So am I. They are beared? So am I. They are theologisms? So am I. They are deputants? So am I. They are philosophem? So am I. They are disjudent to me I. They are fecturers? So am I. They are disjudent to be an I. They are lecturers? So am I. They are disjudent to be do I. And I will boast still further. I can expound the Praises and the Prophets, thus they can't do. I can interpret; they, they can't."

He preceds in the same win and finally concludes. "And if there is one amorget them who rightly understands a single preface or chapter of Aristotle, then I will allow myerif to be toward. Here I am not too preserving with my words."—And yet there is stid more to believe that does not belong to the subject! Having had his say he begans again? "Give no further answer to these donkeys when they idly bray about the word? wis," but morely tell them? "Listing will have it so and mys he is a Doctor above all the Doctors of the Papacy." There it shall remain; in future I will despise them atterly and have them despised, so long as they contains to be such people, I mean, dunkeys. For there are unbashing accounted amongst them who have never even learnt their own, vis. the cophists, art, for instance, Dr. 5-hmidt, Dr. Dirty Scoon [Cochleus, and their ilk. And yet they dare to stead in my way."

He nevertheless seeks to give a more estisfactory answer, and admits, "that the word ' alone in not found in either farm or Greek tout, . . . at the letters of which our denkeys stare lake cows at a new gate. Thry don't see that the meaning of the text requires it. 1. The sect assertion may be taken for what it is worth. The pencipal thing, however, is that he introduced the interpolation with a meaning of his own, though he could not have held that his doctrine of a dead faith (for this was what his " faith alone " amounted to) ready tailed with the Apostle s trucking. On this point he is quite elect in his strongs answers. He is far more concerned in parrying the blows with his rhotorical artifice. His appeal to the will of Dr. Martin Luther may be termed the front of a staful awardsman, his whole treatment of the matter is designed to surprise, to puzzle and amuse, and, so a matter of fact, cond impress only the populace. It is not without reason that Adolf Hamarit speaks of the "strange ingic of his arguments, the faults of his exegens and the myintion and barbanty of his polemes." #

* Works " Wests of 30, 2, p. 635 f., Ed. ed., 65, p. 107 (sp. "Briofweelstel," 0, p. 269), in the "treather 6 von Determination of the form of a letter, published by Westersham Lask in Poptersham, 1430, at Lasting a majorito.

^{* &}quot;Dogmangesch.," 34, p. 0.7

The strange controversal methods of his rhetoric give, however, a true picture of his soul.

All this inconstancy and self-contradiction, this restless upheaval of assertions, now rendered doubtful by their palpable exaggeration, now uncertain owing to the admixture of humour they contain, now questionable because already rejected elsewhere by their author, all this mirrors the unrest of his soul, the sigzag course of his thought, in short a mind unemightened by the truth, which theires only amidst the excitement of conflict and contradiction. Moderation in resolve and deed is as little to his taste as any consistent submission of his word to the voke of reflection and truthfulness. He abandons his actions as well as his most powerful organ, his voice, to the impulse and the aims of the moment. He finds no difficulty, for instance, even in his enrly days, in soundly rating his fellow-monks even in the most insulting and haughty manner, and in assuring them in the same breath of his "peaceable heart" and his "perfect calm," or in shifting the responsibility for his earber outbursts of anger on God. Who so willed it and Whose action enapot be withstood. All this we find in his letter in 1514 to the Erfurt Augustinians, where his singular disposition already reveals itself.3 No less easy was it to him at the commencement of his struggle to protest most extravagant humility towards both Pone and Emperor, to liken himself to a "flea," and yet to promise resistance to the uttermost. He was guilty of exaggeration in his championship of the downtrodden peasants before the war, and, when it was over, was again extravagant in his demand for their punishment. With an all too lavish hand he abandons Holy Scripture to each one's private interpretation, even to the "miller's maid," and yet, as soon as anyone, without the support of "miracles," attempted to bring forward some new doctrine differing from his own, he withdrew it with the utmost imperiousness as a treasure reserved.

As in style, so in deed, he was a charmeteon. This he was in his inmost feelings, and not less in his theology.

In one matter only did he remain always the same, on ² Letter of Jan. 16, 1514, "Bnefwechsel," 1, p. 17 f.

On his theology op. the numerous instances given in Denific, e.g., 1³, pp. 467, 469, 657. P. 468: "He is always playing with grotesque ideas." Op. also, ibid., p. 454 f.

one point only is his language always consistent and clear, viz. in his hatred and defiance of the Church of Rome. Some have praised his straightforwardness, and it must be admitted, that, in this particular, he certainly always shows his true character with entire unrestraint. This hate permeates all his thoughts, his prayer, all his exalted reflections, his good wishes for others, his sighs at the approach of death. Even in his serious illness in 1827 he was, at least according to the account of his friend Jonas, principally concerned that God should not magnify his enemies, the Papists, but exalt His name "against the enerates of His most holy Word"; he recalls to mind that John the Evangelist, too, "had written a good, strong book against the Pope" (the Apocalypse); as John did not die a martyr, he also would be content without martyrdom. Above all, he was not in the least contrite for what he had printed against the doctrines of the Pope, "even though some thought he had been too outspoken and bitter "1 In his second dangerous illness, in 1587, Luther declared even more emphatically, that he had "done right" in "storming the Papacy," and that if he could live longer he would undertake still "worse things against that beast."

Luther's overestimation of himself was partly due to the seductive effect of the exaggerated praise and admiration of his friends, amongst whom Jones must also be reckoned. They, like Jones, could see in him nothing but the "impiration of the Holy Ghost," Luther's responsibility must appear less to those who lay due stress on the surroundings amidst which he lived. He was good-natured enough to give credence to such eulogies. Just as, moved by sympathy, he was prone to lavish alms on the undeserving, so he was too apt to be influenced by the exaggerations of his admirers and the applicase of the masses, though, occasionally, he did not fail to protest.

This veneration went so far that many, in spite of his remonstrances, placed him not only on a level with but even above the Apostles.4 His devoted pupils usually called him Elias. He himself was not average to the thought that he had something <sup>Colleq.," ed. Bindseil, 3, p. 162.

Ancle, 6, p. 185 f., in the so-called "first Will".
Jorda, ii, his pan as ric or Earther.</sup>

Up e.g. Mathesium, 'Tischreden," pp. 83 and 126.

in common with the fory prophet. As early as 1522 Welfgang Rychard, his sealous assistant at Ulra, greets him in his letters as the risen Elsas, and actually dates a new era from his coming. In this the physician Magenbuch imitated him, and the title was as well received by Melanchthon and the other Wittenbergers as it was by outsiders 1. In the Preface which Lather weets in 1530 to a work by the theologian Johann Brenz, he contrasts the comperative calmness of the preacher to his own ways, and remarks that his own uncouth style venuted forth a chans and torrent of words, and was storing and fierce, because he was ever bettling with countless hordes of monsters, he had received as his share of the lourfold spirit of Elisa (4 Kings mx.), the " whirlwind and the fire" which "overthrow mountains and appropted rocks"; the Heavenly Father had bestowed this upon him to use against the thick heads, and had made him a "atrong wedge wherewith to split sounder hard blocks."3

When, in 1532, his great victory over the Sacramentarians was discussed in the circle of his friends, the words of the Magdeburg Chancellor, Laurentius Zoch, recurred to him: " After reading my books against the Sacramentanens he said of me. Now I see that this man is enlightened by the Hely Ghost; such a thing as this no Papist could ever have achieved," " and so, Lather adds in corroboration," he was won over to the Evangel; what I say is, that all the Paputa together, with all their strength, would not have been able to refute the Sacramentarians, either by authority [the Fathers] or from Scripture. Yet I get no thunks ("

Not his admirers only, but even his literary opponents contributed, at least indirectly, to inflate his rhetoric and his assurance; his sense of his own superiority grew in the measure that he saw his foes lagging for behind him both in language and in vigour.

Amongst the Catholic theologians of Germany there were too few able to compete with him in point of literary dexterity. Luther stood on a pinnacle and carried away. the multitude by the war-cry he hurled over the heads of the Catholic polemists and apologists who bore witness to the ancient truths, some well and ereditably, others more humbly and awkwardly. The apparent disadvantage under which the Catholic writers laboured, was, that they were not so relentless in treading under foot considerations of charity and decency; unlike him, they could not address flery appeals to the passions in order to enlist them as their allies, though traces far too many of the violence of the conflict are found even in their polemics. Amongst them were men of high culture and refinement, who stood far above the turmoils of the day and knew how to estimate them at their true worth. They felt themselves supported by the Catholics throughout the world, whose most sacred possessions were being so unjustly attacked.

Behingmissufen, "Anfærehmangen," p. 31

For proofs see Enders, "Lathers Briefwechool," 4, p. 89, a. 3. Cp. vol. ii , p. 162 f., vol. in , p. 322, and above, p. 269.

* "Weeke," Weem ed., 30, 2, p. 650; "Opp. lat. var.," 7, p. 512.

CHAPTER XXVII

VOICES FROM THE CAMP OF THE DEFENDERS OF THE CHURCH

1. Luther's "demoniscal" storming. A man "persected"

We have plenty descriptions of Luther from the pen of literary opponents, and they have a perfect right to be taken into account, for they are so many voices courageously raised in defence of the heirloom of the faith. What has led to this being so often passed over is the fear lest their censure should be taken as prejudice, and, needless to say, what they tell us must be earefully weighed. Much depends on the circumstances in which they wrote, on the character of the writers, on the content of their statements and on how far they differ from or agree with other witnesses and the known facts. Several striking passages from their writings, in so far as they are confirmed either by Luther himself or by his followers, have already been utilised in the present work and have served to complete our picture of Luther's mind

Catholic polemists all agree on one point, viz. that the bitter and unkindly ways of their adversary were a clear proof that he had no Divine call Like Erasmus, they too contend that no man who exerted such great commotion and was so insatiable in abuse and vitugeration could be honestly furthering God's eause. Like Erasmus, they too question whether such unheard-of presumption could "be combined with an apostolic spirit or did not rather denote madness." They compare his inconstancy, his passion and his fickleness to a "restless, stormy sea." His slanderous tongue, which so unsparingly lashed the olden Church and its doctrines, reminds them of the "roaming lion," who, according to St. Peter, " goeth about seeking whom he may devour," or of the " fiery darts " of the wicked one against whom St. Paul utters a warning. With pain and horror they call to mind the seven-headed beast of the Apocalypse, that rises out of the deep, bearing names of blasphemy and with a "mouth that speaks great things and profanities."

352

Their strictures cannot be examined in detail here, but we may instance a truit which is common to many of these writers and which, though kept in the background as not altogether relevant to the discussion, yet deserves consideration as a proof of the effect that Luther's unbounded hate, his abuse and his arrogance had on the feelings and judgment of contemporaries. Their keen sense of religion made them ascribe his behaviour to the devil, and to assume, or at least to suspect, that he was in some way possessed. It is curious to note how many unbentatingly have recourse to this explanation.

"We must regard it so a mire sign of demonstrial possession," wrote Johann Hoffmesster, Prior of the Colmar Augustinians, "that Luther should thus persistently enjoin on preachers as a duty to go on curving and denouncing from the pulpit, though he himself aces and howals the fact, that contempt for religion, godlessness and every vice is steadily garning ground in Germany. What can we expect unfortunate youths to learn from such abuse and revaling in the churches ! "!

"Lather is the devil's own bellows," wrote Paul Bachmann, Abbot of Altselle, in 1834, " with which the devil blows up a wharlwind of error, senadal and heresy." He goes even further and appeals to what he had heard from Luther's brother monks concerning the scene in choir, when, falling into a fit, Luther had frantically protested that he was not the man possessed (vol. i., p. 17)."

Bachmann adds: " Luther is the ernal monster that John the ¹ Dieta memorabilia," Colonia, 1843, p. 13′. Cp. M. Paulus, ¹⁰ Hoffmeister," p. 53, n. 4

1 " Lobgening and des Luthers Winckelmeine " Leipzig, 1636, Bl. D 2" The author axis, that Luther hims if admin in his " Von der Winckelmeine " that he had received his ideas on the Mass " through the disputation and revelation of the devil " (Bl. A 2).

trusthch Rade." Deciden, 1534 Bi C 3': "His benther mould who were with him in the Convent at Erfort, my, that once, when the Gospel 'Jesus was casting out a devil and it was dumb' was being read, Luther fell down and by for some time acrossing, 'I am not dumb. I am not dumb'." Bachmann also mentions the same incident in "Ein Maisliterich dem Lutherschon... Bachm. das Closterichen au lessen." (Dresden, 1534), B. B.2. Cp. O. Cleman. "Paul Hachmann." ("M. Archiv f. sächn Geach.," 26, 1906, p. 20). In "Ein Maisliterich." he are says: "What sort of an attack would that be, Littuer were I to write or relate what some say vis. that the devil Inculum was your father? I will however refram from doing so and not bring this charge against you." (Bl. B.1'). He thinks he has stronger evidence for Litther's possession than for this legend.

Apostic saw roung out of the deep, with open pairs to utter about and b-asphorny." "This is no more matches man, but the wicked devid hisrarif to whom no lying, decent or fabricular too much."

Even from mon who had long soled with Lather we hear minist things; for instance, Williams Perkhauser of Nuramorez taxa bluntly: "Lether, with his impudent and defeat tongue, betwee plainly enough what it is his heart; he makes to have gone quite mad, or to be agitated by some weeked decree."

Evenue decired that people, rather than sweet his enumera, would say that he was steeped in vergobilenes, saintally decauged, or presented by some senister spirit.

¹ Op. above, p. 101

A Letter of 1829 to Prior Kilian Leib of Robiert, in Döllinger, "References," I p 633 and J Betliebt, Leibs Bradworbant," p. 12, from Leib, "Verentworting des Klosterstandes," Bl. 170'; " of a main demand artifer;"

maio damento agitari 11 * In his " Parps to adv. spinto-san non-solvens Littlers," 1834, 10, enl. 1657 " a simulte guopiam aguari priso" (for trio whole passage one wor us p. 136. a. 2). It is worth wash to must from the deply of Ersamon and from his "Hypersopouter" agrant Lather, total passages as which he expresses doubte as to Luther's montal equilibrium of as to his subsecty. In his " Purposes " r. $344; Reserves was of sertain propositions of Lather's "Num has tun delire videnter phononics at adv. templotes queen mon " to 1546. " Desprey, as Martingo John corest goom have deliraments enapperate dissert * Arbitror, Occidem olim dixisse saniora, cham estra lucida internalla " (c. 1547). " Wie nikil creput mest Schinnus, Deaboles, Larvas, Lamesas, Meparen, charque races plus quem tragicos. Fortueses ex abundantes. oordis oo loquitur ; certe huit esse solent wratura insania goveengia " (c. 1542). "Ques cum acribit, redetur sebi mera dueda; serum bese delucare defense underer eine ment anderer (r. 1543). Martin may mich to make here out an arbitrary but his reaction nove mure labely to look upon burn highwelf an mod (cotton from highwaters " etc., e. 1867 first passage In the first brink of his. Representation? (sk) he writes "How onem town studio and alies addedit two libro, and non cros sobrins, gunum geriberne 11 (c. 1281), "Totas enim his arnous supet cultinum, in quat root ashrina videtter han arrepaton " (c. 1367). " Bi qui han meribit, sobreus est, ego manquem unde ternalentem?! (c. 1971). "Ques non ordet have more month worth, nor agree freehoram, gained have secretal and are source question models entire (c. 194). An hie Lutherns enterer fusion sobring? ". (c. 1411; in connection with Lattier's mourtion that God had wrought the avil in Pharaok). "New est sobrose, ist paneia dicam, non vino fortanta aut cerevima, sed philantsa et dificultua questim modedicende, qua nunquem autorur, quantumem arec sugarga-tamerit 15 (c. 1477). 11 Quans multa hac delirat Lutherna, sine mente Annalous works " (r. 1479) - Engliser a sovitere parency - Caugust Nebut (groy or a Franciscon of hardly wave speaks lies bresses and describes or of one possessed ("Replica," a. l. et. a., Augsh., 1522. f E l), the Parte theologian Jodenia Ch. htoveus (Antilu herus * Parte 1836, f. 884.) speaks of it in the seese way. All these statements with thems arreary given are wirth the consideration of packstopida, through emenating from opposition, their number gives them importance

Even Lather's brother monk at Erfurt, Johann Nathin, who had been struck with wonder at the young monk's sudden conversion, remarked later, when the two had gone different ways, that "a spirit of apostasy had entered him," which was corrupting all the clorgy.5

Johann Cochinus thinks that Luther's unboly doctrine reermbies a dragon with seven heads, such a monster hailed, not from God, but from the devil.* He allows himself to be carried so for away by his conviction that Luther was possioned, as to prove all caution and to take literally a certain shotorical statement of Luther's, where he tells us that he had eaten more than a bushel of and with the devil, and that he had hold a disputation with him on the Mass. 1 Cochleus here lays great stress on the views and reports of Luther's former associates in the monastery.4

Under the impression made on him by the vehemence of Luther's language and his whole conduct, Hieronymus Errauf declared subsequently to Luther's so-called " great Reformation Writings " : "This monk who has gone astray differs from the dovil only in that he corres out what the wicked one inspires han with."4 Emer, too, appeals to Lather's former associates in the monastery: Luther "was powering by the evil spirit from his youth upwards, he says, " as is well known in his monastery at Erfurt, where he made his profession."

Kikan Leib, a contemporary defender of the Church in the Exchange district, tells in his Armale of the impression made upon those present by Luther's behaviour at the Diet of Worms. He displayed such pade in his manner and conduct that we seemed to have before in the image of the enemy of mankind. The latter rains have dwelt within him and instructed him, if indeed he does not still do so '. He quotes with approval Ernser's first statement, and, from Cochisus, the passage where Luther speaks of his cating salt with the devil."

* Dungersheim, " Erzeigung, p. 15, His authority is a statement twee made by Nathin, first (see above, p. 352, n. 3), that Luther as a young monk fell into a fit is choir during the reading of the Gospel on the man postwood, " and had raved like one puse wod," and then a later more detailed explanation of the same incident.

5 " Septice pr Latherus ubique sibi sum semptis contrarris," Denda, 1529 (dedication,

2 "Commentaria de actas et scriptia M. Lutheri," (ed. Mogunt., 1549), p. l.

* Ibid.

* " Auff des Stierre tzu Wiestenberg wiettende Replies," end. In Enders, "Luther und Emser," 2, p. 25 f.

" "Auss was Grund und Ursach Luthers Dotmetschung . . . verbotten worden sey," 1523. In "Zu Lutoers Vorred sum Romer-brief," Bl. 65".

7 " Hotoris mu temporis," ed. Aretin I. Beitz zur Gesch, und Lit.," 7. Munich, 1806, p. 535 ff.), p. 666; "Quam clata exercise tumidisque morebus expresserit produteritque superkiam, ut sathana unieria vel enni in perene alexes, hoog ilia allane et premi plorez giordami (in 19 limago) #39 of the class." * Jirid , p. 462.

Histonymus Dungsruheum, the opponent to whom we swe Nathra's remark, given above, upbraids Luther, the " child of Dehal," for his "devilah writings" "whereby he, and fotos through him, blasphomes Christ."1

Assender the Nuncio reported on April 17, 1521, from the Diet of Worms, that some regarded Lather as mad, others as "possessed"; he also mentions on the testumony of others how Luther, on his arrays, " had gazed about him with the eyes of a demon."

The Reschetageabachied of Worms speals of Luther as "led by the evil spirit," may, "as the wicked enemy lumied clad in human form."4

In the tract against a pamphlet of Luther's published by Duke George of Saxony in 1511 under Frank Arnold, a pame, we read at the very commencement, that Lather was hong many of his artherents because he accoved his hand " in clearly and plainly in his writings, that, as they said, Luther must certainly be possessed of the devil, andeed of the whole logion that Christ draws out of the man presented and into the herd of swing, who forthwith went raving mad and run headlong into the sea ": " By the fruits [of his words] we may recognise the spirit."*

Johann Dietenberger, as early as 1524, in his "Against the unchristian book of Martin Lather on the abuse of the Mass." save: "There is no doubt whatever that the hornel damnable Luthersa doctrine has been brought into the world by the dovil, otherwise it would not be so atterly beastly and contentious, quarrenome and fickle, and so fitted for everything evil." "These are all manifest lies, nothing but abuse, stander and blasphomy, devition tire and works by which Lather the arch-liar has desven the world to the devil. " He calls Lather "the devil a hired mesonger" and mys of his member of writing: " Here everything recks of devile; nothing that the devilub man writes each stand without the devil who endevils all his products "A

The Hatseben Benedictine, Christopher Hoffmann († 1534), in his sermons to the Chapter presched before 1525 represents Luther as an apostate and as "demons plenus,"

The anonymous "Indicium de Leuhere" included in a German codes at Musich and details from the early years of the controversy, also sincerves to be mentioned. The author sadeed praises Luther's learning all too generously, but then goes on to 4 " Dadelung," p. 14.

Brieger, "A condet und Lather," pp. 147, 143 Kalkoff, "Dis-Dependen Alconders vom Wormeer Beichstage", 1897, p. 171.

" Reichstagsakten unter Kauer Karl V." J. p. 718 ff.

 Worke," Erl. ed., 25°, p. 129 f
 Quoted by W. Walther, "Fur Luther," p. 213 Holl, 214, from Dietenherger a work against Luther's dectri is of nuncular Confession. To speak and teach as Luther did was to have "a compact and also ice with the poisson of the devil and with eternal douth." Ibid, surrior statements from Emser and others.

* O. Kronseder, "Christophorus Hoffmann," 1898, p. 57, with reference to Cod. Monac. lat., 14626, p. 126.

may, that he sooked on him as "no Christian," and to speak of the "deval's broad" by whom Martin Luther is possessed.

Barthold of Chierrane in his "Tewtsche Theologny" considers that in his day false teaching has been opread abroad "by a horrid doval," who makes use of wicked men, the "deval, with his wicked company, has attered up hereny."

Petrus Sylvius, in 1534, after a lengthy discourse on Luther's "seductive and damnable" manner of "slandering and blaspherning," says, that he was "an very truth a possessed and devileh man "1

In order the better to explain how these and many other of Luther's contemporaries came to see a diabolical influence in his work, we may quote a few words from Johann Adam Mohler's lectures on Church History (published posthumously): "We find Luther is 1020 and 1021 displaying a feveral literary activity that arouses in the reader a horrible magiving. An uneasy sense of discomfort oppresses us, and a secret shudder runs through our frame when we think of the boundless selfishness and presumption which holds sway in this man; we seem to be standing within the inner circle where that sinuster power rules, which, from the beginning of the world, has ever been speking to teint the history of our race."

Luther lunsels, as early as 1518, aliadra to opponents of his who descried in him the influence of the devil. In a letter to l'rutletter, his old master, his says: "They speak of me from the pulpit as a heretie, a madman, a tempter and one possessed by I know not how many devils"; but " let people say, hearken to and helieve what, where and as much as they will, I shall do what God inspires me to do."A

Paolo Vergerio, the Nuncio, whose detailed account of his interview with Luther has siready been related (vol. in., p. 426 ff.), speaks, like Aleander, of his "strange look," which, the longer be observed it, the more it reminded him of persons he had formerly aren whom some regarded as possessed, his eyes were restlemend uncarny and hore the stamp of rage and anger. "Whether he he possessed or not," he says, "in his behaviour he is the personification of presumption, wickedness and indiscretion."

Cod. Monac. gerin., 4842, Bl. 2. Cp. above, p. 242.

Ed. Reithmoier, p. 2, 165.

N. Panine, "Due destaches Dominikaner," p. 33.—What the Catholics thought will be better in densitied when we remember that even H. Bullinger, in his "History of the Reformation" (ed. Hottinger and Vingell, 2, Francolell, 1838, p. 239), says of Luther's "Kurta Bear itms" of 1544. "Although he had previously written much that was allow so, insulting and even blasphenous, yet he outdood himself in the shareful wanten and offersive werea he uses at this booklet. He bursts for very devals... and acts life a same processed."

§ 5 KG , 3d Gains 3, 1808, p. 105 f.

A factor of May 1, 1518 Berefacched, 2 1 p. 180.

* Ed. Preshueto g (Numbeturber: hie man Deutschland," 1535-15-9, vol. (), j. 544, report on New 13, 1535.

The statements regarding Luther's eyes made by various persons who know han would appear to have furnated many with a ground for thinking him under some distributed spell. " Luther's dark and quarkling eyes, deep-set and keen . . . must indeed have made an even greater impression than the best of Cranach's portraits."1

While his friends, Melanchthon for instance, saw in them the expression of a high minded and noble nature and a "leonine glance," * many Catholics, him Vergerie, new the reflection of a sparit homile to God. At Worms, as already related, Aleander had said, though only on the strength of hearsay, that Luther had "the eyes of a demon," and a Spanish account from Worms also remarks: 'his eyes forebode no good '* Cardinal Cajetan, in his examination of Luther at Augsburg, stated, that he would confer no more with him; "he has deep-set eyes and atrunge function in his head "4. The University Professor, Martin Polkeh, of Melrichatatt (Mellerstadt), accuss to have let fall a semilar remark during Luther's early years at Wittenberg, he too mentioned his "deep-set sym" and "strange fascies. It may be, however, that Lather, who tells us this, erroneously puts into Polich's mouth the remark actually made by Captan. 18 was Politch also who often decisied, that this monk would one day overthrow the system of teaching which had hitherto prevaried in all the Universities." Johannes Dantiscus, a Pole, who visited Luther daning a journey through Germany and who subsequently become Bushop of Culm and Ermeland, expresses himself very frankly. He says. His eyes were keen and sparkled strangely, as as sometimes the case with those possessed ! Luther's own pupil, Johann Reuster, also found something köntlin Kawerau, 2, p. 518.

1. Melanchthoniana, 2 ed. O. Waltz (* Zeitschr. f. RG., 4, 1380, p. 224 M; are also above vol. 1, p. 279, n. 2. According to Economic Alber, a personal acquaintance friend and account of latther a the latter had a "time open and brave countenance and hawk a cyce." Cp. Alber, "Weder die verfischte Lehre der Carlstadter," Bl. f. 3 ff.; nce Köstlin-Kawermi, 2. p. 518

"Reschatageakton unter Kaierr Karl V," 2, p. 632 : " en les ojos

no han señalado. H

According to Myconius, "Butoma Reformationss," p. 30 ag (written after 1541). Cordains, "Tagebuch," p. 97: "Cardinalis Augusto d' e de me - sate feuter habet profuncio cenno, adea et maratales phanicates in capite habet."

Poblec's remark ("Colloq.," ed. Bindseil, 3. p. 154, from Bebenstock) has been characterized quite wrongly by O. Waltz (" Zeitschr. f. KG " 2 - 878 p. 627) as apartons and a late interpullation. As a matter of fact is had merely been excluded from the Table Talk by Aurifaber; see Seidemann in "Zeitsche, f. KO.," 3, 1879, p. 303 Cp vol 1, p 86 n 6.

Abeve, vol. i., p. 86.

J. Letter of Aug. 8, 1523, in Hipler, "Nikolum Kopernikus und Luther," 1868, p. 73. Höffer, "Adrian VI," p. 320, n. 2, quotes a remark of Dantucks on Lattice ... oftenens over four demandment." January-Pastor, * Gesch. des deutschen Volkes,* 220, p. 194, p. 3.

unconstortable about his gance: He had " jet black brown and eyes that sparkled and twinkled like stars, so that A was no ensy thing to fix them." "

In the shove statement concerning Ligher's look and the likelihood of his being presented, Vergerio also has a passing allusion to a certain crucio tale then current which quite behitted the take of the age and which he gives for what it may be worth in his official report, via that Ligher was begotten of the devil. This tale also found its way into several Catholic works written in that credulous and deeply agitated period.

It was not the first time such things had been invented concerning a person who was an object of all-will in that age when prejudice told so strongly.

Luther himself was in the habit of speaking of the actual necurrence of dishelizar boths and of the "dishelizar scedus", he not only did not man above the vulgar beliefs handed down by a credition post, but even imparted to them, at sent in for an the power of the devil west, a still more disper. He sever tired of filling the imagnistion of the reader with disbolical himself (vol. v., xxxi., 4), and he spoke of persons possessed as though the world were replete with them.

If we could trust Cochleus, Lather's heather monits would seen to have partly here reconnuitle for the report not more y of a disbolical presencion ("obsessio, erroreseesso"), but also of a certain wiful league with the devil entered into by the young Augustinian. They could not forget the "enignianty" of the young monit, particularly that once, during his fit in choir whist the Cospel of the game research was being read, he had ened out,

¹ "Subbata," St. Callen, 1902, p. 85.

He refere emply to what he knew from some of Lather's intimate friends "concerning his birth and past life up to the time of his becom-ang a mork "

 In his Exposition of the Ten Commandments, published in 1818. and frequently reprinted during his bictime, "Worke," Weira, ed., 1, o. 407; "Opp. lat. exeg.," 12 p. 18; "Among the devils there are such that and success? of which tells because note filters mentantely." which he then proceeds to do. The colors are according to him, abortions. According to a statement in the Lebis Lade however, they were "clevils with bodies like the mothers," or stolen children, or changelings, like one he wished to have drowned because the devil constituted the soul in its body ("Wirks | Fr. ed. 60, pp. 27-42). In his exposition of General (up vi) buther admits the existence and activity of the and "mean," He decimes be had nearl from many presum credible instances and had himself met with such (2), and even appeals to St. Augustino (" Hos negare inspedentia videtae" De cir Dei," 15, c. 23); he remarks, however, that it was a tegether false to believe that " anything could be norm of a umon of devil and man "; on the controly those taken for the devil's offspring, some of whom he had seen, had either been distorted by the clevit though not actually begotten by him or wire real devia who had either teammed firsh in appraising or Jornwool it elsewhere with the devils help. "Opp. lat. exeg.," 2, p. 127. Cp. N. Paulus, "Hencewahn und Hexesprocess vernehmuch im 16. Jahrh.," Freiburg, 1910, p. 35 f.

"I am not he ". Cochless, who had some intercourse with the Augustmans at Nuromberg, hints in his Commentaries at the "secret intercourse with the demon" of which Luther was suspected, and unmediately afterwards refers, though under a misapprehension, to Luther's own remerk about eating salt with the devil, and holding a disputation with him. The passage frequently attributed to Cochlaus, via that it was notorious "the devil Incubus was Luther's father," and son of the devil his " real name, therefore remain the devil's son as long se you live,"2 was, however, never penned by him. But he was aware of the reports on this subject already in circulation and never new fit to trent them with the contempt they described.

All the passages quoted above regarding Luther a being possessed of the devil are in every instance quite independent of this stupid tale : they are based throughout on the character of Luther's writings and on his public behaviour.

The first to relate anything concerning Luther's dishelsest parentage was, according to N. Paulus, Petrus Sylvius in his polemics of 1631 1634. He recounts with perfect seriousness the information which he says he had from an "honest, godfearing woman," who had heard it from some former female friends of Luther's mother to whom the inter had hereoif disciosed the fact : "At night time, when the doors were locked, a beautiful youth dround in red had frequently visited her before the Carn val," etc. Nome such sele tale may have reached the ears of the Legate Vergerse during his travels through Germany in that some decade. Foundly he may have expressed herself in private with greater credulity concerning this story than in line official report, for Contaring goes so far as to write that Vergerie "had found that Martin was begotten of the devil."

The ailly story ought to have made all Luther's later enties. more eastious, even with regard to the statements regarding Luther's obsession by the Evil One. The few Catholic writers, who have ventured even in our own day to assert that Luther was possessed, should have been deterred from entering a region so obscure and where the danger of missing one's way is so great. Even in the case of persons still living it is rash and often morally in possible to diagnose a tuse of possession; much more is this the case when the person in question has so long been dead.

^{1 &}quot;Commentana," p. 2 "aios es accidio aliquo cum damone

^{*} The writing in question, "Em Maubstreich," etc., is not by Cochleun but by Paul Backmann. See above, p. 352, n. 3.

* Paulus (p. 356, n. 3), p. 64 f., from Sylvans, "Zwer neugedruckte Büchlem," 1533, p. 3′, and "Dio letzten awar Hüchlem," 1534 - Cp. also has work of 1531, "Em besonder nützlichen, . . . Büchlem, "Friedensburg (above, p. 356, n. 6), p. 554.

2. Volume of Converts

Of the Catholic writers, those in particular were sure of a hearing amongst the educated, who for a long while and until it revealed itself in its true colours, had been inclined to Luthermann. Such was, for instance, the case with several of the pupils and admirers of Erasmus. Among these were Ulrich Zastus and Silvius Egranus, who, though ready to criticise Luther severely, were not wanting in words of prame. The latter was a good type of the half f'edged convert.

Silvius Egranus (see vol. in., p. 402), for instance, wrote: "I do not deny that Luther has spirit and inventive genius, but I find him utterly wanting in judgment, learning and prudence. . . . Luther's foolhardy abuse, his defiance and violence, breed nothing but unutterable confusion. Nowhere do I are Christian godliness flourishing in the hearts of men, nay, owing to Luther, it is not safe even to speak of the Gospel of Christ or of Paul." 1 " I declare that Luther's doctrine is a web of sophisms, is geither ecclesiastical nor Apostolic, but closely related to that sophistical buffoonery and strong language to which he is ever having recourse." -Ulrich Zassus, a Humanist, and at the same time learned in the law, after changing his views, publicly took the field against Luther even in official academical discourses: he maintained nevertheless that he had been led by Luther to a deeper knowledge of the spirit of Christ. his itall and talent be never even questioned; he declared: "There is something in Luther's spirit that meets with my approval." What alienated him from Luther was not only his attack on the authority of the Pope-with the grounds of which Zassus was well acquainted from his study of Canon Lawbut his denial of the ment of good works. This contention seemed to him diametrically opposed to Holy Scripture. "You reject (meritorious) good works," he says to Luther's followers, " and yet I know One Who says: Their works shall follow them."4 He finds it necessary to reprove Luther Epistole," ed. Riegger, Ulmw, 1774, p. 12. Döllinger, 666., p. 156.

* R. Stintzing "Ulrich Zasius," Basic, 1857 p. 236, from the letter of Zasius to Thomas Blacker, Dec. 21, 1521. Briefwechsel der Brucer Blaurer 1, 1986, p. 42 ft Letter to Barth domew Goisbaus, in Weller, "Altes sun allen Theden der Gesch., t. p. 178. Döllinger, "Reformation," 1, p. 133.

 Letter to Nicholas Gennder, Weller, 1916, 2 p. 780 f.; Dollinger, 1916, 135.

sharply for his unmeasured, nav, shameless boasting of his gifts, for exciting enmity, strife, dissension and factions, and for inciting to ill-will and murder. "What shall I say," he exclaims, " of the boldness and impudence with which Luther interprets the Testaments, both Old and New, from the first chapter of Genesis to the very end, as a tissue of menaces and imprecations against Popes, bishops and priests, as though through all the ages God had had nothing to do but to thunder at the priesthood "1 Elsewhere he bewails with noble indignation the fate of his beloved fatherland: 44 Luther, the fee of peace, and the most worthless of men, has let loose the furies over Germany so that we must regard it as a real mercy if speedy destruction does not ensue. I should have much to write upon the subject If only my grief allowed me."*

Zasius and Egranus, however, like others in a aimilar walk of life and who were disposed to seek a compromise, never attacked the new teachers, their reputation and their supposed wisdom as decidedly as did those whose deeper knowledge of theology taught them how dangerous the CITORS Were.

One well equipped for the literary struggle with Luther was the convert George Wicel, a priest who had married and settled down as a Lutheran paster and then, after a thorough study of holy Scripture and the Fathers, had resigned his post and published an "Apologia" at Leipzig in 1585 to justify his return to the Church of his Fathers.

In a multitude of polemical treatises, often couched in caustic language, he exposed the untenability and the innate contradictions of the Wittenberg doctrines. Of this hated "apostate" Luther speaks in a characteristic letter of 1635.2. He writes to the Mansfeld Chancellor Caspar Muller, about a new work of Wicel's: This Masterlet, as he hears for he himself "read none of their books "—has again been throwing sweetmeats to his swine, the Catholica. "Such guests are we I served by such a cook."

Owing to his stay at Wittenberg and Eisleben, Wicel was well fitted to paint a reliable picture of the morals there prevailing. He utilised his experiences in his "Refertio Lutherstown:" (1538), and summed up his case against Linther as follows: "The life of the great mass of Evangeli also note little Evangelical that I have thousands and thousands of times felt most heartsly mehamed of it. Only too quickly have most of them esticed. In the posionous doctrine, that works are of no avail and that are to not amputed to the bourser. 15 Concerning one phenomenon, which Lather hazzed beware as a very pest, via the fear of death, which had become the rate since the prevalence of the new teachting. We cont had some severe thirgs to say, this was strangely at variance with the confidence which Luther's Evengel was supposed to impact. "In at not a deep disgrace," he says, " that those who, formerly, whom they were the followers of Antichrist, to use their own Lutheran phrase, did not fear the plague at all, or at any rate not much, now, as 'Christians,' display such adject terror when it comes ! Hardly may use visite the aick and ne one dares to assist these stricken with the plague. No one will even look at them from a distance, and all are sensed with a stronge pame. Where is that all trevailing faith that is now so often witelled, where as ther love for their neighbour? Tell me. I adjuse you in the natural Christ, whether there has over been less trust or less charity amongst Christians ? ""

¹ Stintzing, ibid.

Ibid., p. 97. Dollinger, ibid., p. 179
 On March 18, 1535, "Briefwerhiel," 10, p. 137.

In the conversations held in that same year in the intrastecareto at Vistoriberg, and preserved for un by Lauterbach the Dencon, Latter frequently abuded to Wood; at that time the latter was in the midst of his successful literary Inbours against the Latherana, and his proposals for reamon, though by no means who ly anti-factory, and even led Dake George of Saxony to agreement him to be Court - Lather, with a hatred quate com rehomble under the coronateness, calls him, according to Lauterback, "the most treacherous of men, mustiwhile its his prolonger, a monophrol who dues not even deserve an mooner ", Water harmelf, he is to us, a noneth money he was defendling, exercise has better for mys, a cause altogether wrong; the unitational elanderer ratio deserved death; only thanks to Latter a traduces, had be found a decent means of livelihood. "Let us ocspose fam ! We most be a lent, pray and bless," in he concludes. " and not bring new faggets to feed the flames." Latter knew perfectly us is that may " new faggote" he might have brought would have burst into flance moor. Wirel's artent pain, to her cwir douds natinge. He does not abrank from the therearly describing Ward elsewisee as a "exception) and versements traiter,"4 and as "a man full of raslice and presumption," He comes along and "boasts of the Pathers. I do not even read his works, for I know his Fathers well; but we have one only Eather, Who is in Heaven and Who is over all Fathers "1 Particularly somitive was he to Wicel's strictures on

* In a 4-20 - a polomonomic antique present etc. Dollinger, that per al.

Lanterback, Tagebuch, p. 108
 Hod., p. 101 f.
 Hod., p. 147

^{*} Betwie," His sey Dollinger, "Reformation," L. p. 57 L.

Files technich, "Trage beich" p. 159 - Cp. Worke, "Est ed., 40, p. 424.

has doctrine of good works, that heet of Arhibes of the new Evangel. Wirel, with every and mechery anys, "that we have tought that, "whoever has once been converted can am no more, and whatever he does in right and good." But the same thing happened to St. Paul and he too had to listen to slanderers, who, because he tought that propin might be saved without the works of the law and merely by faith in Christ, and : "Then let under what is evil and am history that good may come of it, etc. Let us pray against such biosphemy."

Of the consequences of the new teaching levelled at the meritarious nature of good works, Warel had and at the end of his "Apologia": "The Euthern seet has opened wide the flood-gates to introvably and discrete, so that everybody inner to end again over it. If there be anything goddening, good, moral or right to be found as the sect, then it was there before, and did not originate with it. For, show me even men in even thousand, who, having leven formerly goddens and we had, have now, because they are Euthernes, become good and full of the free of God. I could, however, point out some, such as had previously led a devout, processes, inward and harmless life, who are now quite changed by the Evengel. May but the Eard grant them to see and acknowledge what misery they have excited within the German nation. Amen."

Among Weed's "binephenors," as Luther calls them, were some that traversed the latter's assertions that the holy works of positrate and ascetics were atterly worthies, and that the business of a house agent or tax-collector, provided one went about it in faith, maked higher than all the pious works of any ment or hermit.4 . The wretched monexclaims Luther, angry because of his mability to answer the objection, I must idly attacks us; he has no respect for the labours of their calling which tead has communited each man to perform in his state of life, all this he disregards and averely gapes at superstitions, grand and showy works ... " and yet Paul extens the ordinary works of the faithful and lave great stress on their. * This was one of his habitual falsebecids, viz. to make out that Wieel and his other opponents locked down on lowly and commonplace works and the unoffronce performance of the duties of orein calling, more particularly in the life of the world. In resisty, however, they recognised in the most large-minded way the high value of the duties of any worldly calling when done in a religious garst, and repudiated with perfect source the charge brought against Catholicum of undervaluing the ordinary vir use of the good citizena

F " Werke," Ed. ed., 60, p. 323.

^{*} See A. Risss, "Die Convertiten mit der Reformat on" 1, 1966, where the "Apologie" is reprinted, p. 184. Cp. Wicel's remarks above, p. 165 f.

Lanterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 117; "Werke," Erl. ed., 58, p. 420 f.

^{5. &}quot;Werke," of al. . . 3 Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 116.

The section Wicel was not perturbed by Luther's attacks. He continued to demage the Lutheren course by his writings, though the position he took up in ecclementical matters was not always well advised.

Another convert, Veit Amerbach (Amorbach), one of the most capable Humanists of the day, after abandoning the Catholic communion lectured first at Eisleben and then in the philosophical faculty at Wittenberg, till, owing to his patristic studies and after personal conferences with Luther and Melanchthon, he returned to the bosom of the Church in 1548, and at once found a post as lecturer at the University of Ingolatedt. As he declared in a written statement handed to Melanchthon, it was particularly the doctrines of Justification and of the Primacy of the Bishop of Rome that compelled him to side with antiquity and to oppose the innovations.

Too high-minded to abuse his former associates (he even refrained from writing against them), Luther nevertheless, on hearing of his conversion, declared that he would surely turn out later a blasphemer.

"You know," Luther wrote to Lauterbach, "Vitan Amerbach, who left us to go to Ingoletarit, was a man who was never really one of us (1 John ii, 19); he will umtate Eck in his blasphomy of our Word, and perhaps do even worse things." Amerbach having pointed out that the greatest authorities both of East and West had acknowledged the Pope's leadership in the Church, Luther replies in Table-Taik in 1544: "Whence do they get the rotten argument, that the Church must have Rome for its outward head? All history is against anything of the kind. The whole of the West was never under the Pope, nor the whole of the East: It is more pride on Americach's part 1. O God, this is indeed. a fall beyond all other fade! I am sorry about him, for he will occasion great scandal. Poor people, they think not of their last hour " Ah, it is said of them : They went out from us, from the Apostles. But whence came the devil ? From the angels surely. Whence the prostitutes if not from virgins? Whence the knaves if not from the ranks of the grows? Evil must needs come from good."*

Ameriach's opinion of the innevations and of the work of the devil was a different one.

In the Preface to his collection of the Capitalaries of Charles the Great and Lothar,—the soutary passage in which he alkades to the upbeaval he had witnessed, though he reframs from any reference to his former colleagues—he expresses his cherished hope that the Church will ultimately be restored to unity under the successor of Peter; the most pressing thing was to set some bounds to the extraordinary and utterly unrestrained abuse and vituperation, which was not a little promoted by the avaries and flithy vensity of the printers, but which the authorities did nothing to prevent. "At times, when I reflect on this disorder," he says, "it seems to me that men are not filled merely with gall and wormwood, but are verily led and set in motion by devils incarnate. But otherwise it cannot be, so long as, within the Church, the faithful are split up into opposing factions. And would that the populace alone were to blame! I am very much deceived if in any of the books of history even one other example is to be met with of such madness, such furious, poisonous railing and drunken invective."

On Feb. 3, 1944. Briefe," 5, p. 829.

Matheenie, Liechrederi, p. 342.

^{* 16}sd.

Lamentations over the Wounds of the Church and over Har Personnium

With the defenders of the Church the depravity of Luther's teaching, and the immense injury which his work of apostasy was doing to souls, weighed far more heavily than any of the charges we have heard advanced against his person.

In the beginning, it is true, they were chiefly concerned in refuting his new and daring propositions. But, as the years passed and the ruin increased startling accounts of the sad state of religion more and more often find a place in their polemics, the writers urging against Lutheranism the decay of faith and morals which had followed in its train. In their words we can feel even to-day the fervour and the profound anxiety with which they sought to admonish their contemporaries against the destroyer of the Sanctuary and his seductive ways.

When Johann Cuch seus composed the Preface to his "Commentaria de actis et scriptis Martini Luthers," he could not refrain, at the sight of the state of Germany, from giving lively expression to his grief.

To him "the greatest misfortune, which no tears can sufficiently deplote," is "the fall of so many immertal souls, destined by the greec of baptism for his overlasting." "This unhappy strife regarding belief," he writes at the commencement, "has torn them from the bosom and the unity of the Church and will bring them to eternal destruction!" In addition to this there is "a frightful subversion of all things such as no previous hereay had ever brought about." The bond of charity and concord which unites Christian people has been beened, discipline inderwined, reverence for God destroyed, who seems fear extinguished, obedience cost ands, and in their lies prevails an foliness and a freedom that is also to God." In the body of the work he describes with pair and malignation how the uncalled pronchess behaved. 'They come,' so be says in one passage, "and prate of that false freedom which is to set us free from all laws of Church. Pope, behops and Councils. With a cloud of Scriptural texts they undertake to prove, that fasting prayers, vigna and other penitential works are no good whatever that Christ has sufficiently atomal for our one, that fastis alone sufficient that our good works, for from being deserving, are ready anful, and so forth. In gabness of tempos and in energy they are not to be outdone."

¹ "Precipuse constitutiones Caroli M.," etc., Ingolst., 1545, pref. f. A 3n, A 8n; Döllinger, ibid., 1, p. 160.

Johns Bird, Cathedral preacher at Mayence, also describes in moving words the grievous wounds that were being inflicted. on the Church. He was a Franciscus Observantine and was distinguished in his Order for his learning and success. After having been from 1878 preacher at the francy courch at Mayenes, he was appointed in 1830 to the pulpit of the Cathedral, which he retained till his death in 1854. To him it was in partiduo that what was then the ecclesiantical metropolis. of the Khine Province was preserved in the Catholic lath. He was a type of those men who attempted to meet the appritual needs of the day, not by load voiced polemics, but in a conciliatory and prevents fashion, and who insisted that the first requirement was in mateuri the people thoroughly in the faith, and to ruse the moral tone of the faithful. Lather's name he does not mention once in the many columns of his sermons, but the compliants are none the less heartfelt that he pours forth concerning the devastation wrought in the Lord's vineyard, warning his hearers and exhorting them to pity, labour and prayer in the interests of Cattiohours, now in such directors.

"Were to all these," he cries "wite by their preaching have made the world in fravolous and fearlies of God! Our foreighters were better advised to this matter. They ten preached grass, but they did not longet penance." "But now we see, how, by did to the review for as a grad worse of minimum, all fear of tent is driven out of the hearts of men." "One thing will faith, has been extended to the akea, the other via, good works, has been tradition in the miss. The result is that we are now for the most part movely Christians is name, but, so far at works are concerned move deprayed and worked than even Jews or Turks. Not they expect it to be said of them: These are Exampliant preaches, conferring falk, who know how to quot people a consciences." All norts of wickedness, injustice and frivolity increase from day to day." "Since over them were

N. Peodus, "Johann Wald," (3. "Veremeehr, der Gorces Ges.," 1993), p. 15.

^{*} Ibid. * Ibid., p. 34.

Christians in the world a godly life has never been as little esteemed as now "1. This, according to him, is the chief source of all the "very gravous authorings of the Church," in comparamet with which the epolishing of the clergy was not sing, of the loss of sours, and rain of religious life. The course of the Church a pain is that her children have been and are so ismentably led astray, that they refuse any langur to acknowledge their own mether, but avoid and flee from her, deepure her old age, mork at her weakles, laugh at her feebleness, pay no heed to her admonitions, transgrum her laws, formale har doctrine, reject her commands, despute her sacraments, sling to her ensures, wallow in every nort of ain and defile themselves with all kinds of arrors. Who can tell all the majory which is now to be met - with among Christmas by reason of their eine and errors f How should this not rause pain to the Church, our leving Mother ?1-When the decord was on the point of breaking out into an armed conflict, this patriot, deeply moved at the sight of the dissersance that revealed the Fatherland, exclaimed Cormany has become a byword to her neighbours. "Every-body wants a bit of us." We have to submit to bitter score. They may "Hin, these are the hanglisy Germana who help to destroy at other countries and have a fitzer in every war ; now they are going to set to on each other . . . last not a lamertable thing that foreigners and assens should areak thus denoevely of un t . . . We must key it helper tool and beg Him to forgive those whose fault it is that we cannot reach any agreement. I have always feared this cutcome, yet I ever furthered and counselled peace and unity."*

In a writing presented at the Det of Ratalion in 1641 by Dake William of Bavaria, the acts of violence committed by the protesting Letates for yours past were thus suramarised : ." Protestants classess for peace and justice, but in their netions they violate both." The Latholic Estates, " are continually instanted on account of their religion, and great less and injury are inflicted on them. Contrary to the commandment of God, in defiance of law and Christian usages, the Protestante forbid them to preach the Greek and the Word of God openty, their charaban and managerous are sensed by force, their subjects entired away from them by all meaner of devices and taken under the sheder of the Protestants; their religious foundations and property are torn from them mercileoly and used for alors purposes, the graves and monuments of the prous dead, both high and low are deservated and destroyed. The persures and mages of our nevieur Jame Christ, of the charte Virgin Mary and the dear Sounts are justifully demograt and musched to precess." "The Catholics have no dearer wish then for prace and erfer and junker, they too were clamburing for these and not like the Protestants, trying at the same time to uport them. All they assed was to be left in the expoyment of their holy Christian faith and the ordinances of the Christian Church, and not to have their goods violently taken from them." - These complaints were, however meffective, as the Protestant party had already the apper hand in the College of Florters.

³ Ibid., p. 35. 4 Ivid., p. 40. 5 Ibid., p. 13 f.

At the Dat of Worms in 1846 the complimits were renewed on the Catholic ade: "The Protestants have made themselves inneless of churches and momentum and have driven into matery all who wasted to aude by the old faith. They have invaded harrogenes and have been rection of justice and poore; have constrained the poor manhstants to embrace their religion. as, for metazon in the haid of Brunswick, where they had no other rurst than the might of the sword. They trample under foot and oppens everything, and then complain of being themselves apprenied." "They are meatishle in their demands and are for ever producing fresh carde to play, at every Dist putting forward fresh clauras which they treast on having conceded to them before they will take part in the transactions of vote supplies. * The Cathodes further deciseed in the sittings of a committee at Worms in ensure to the charges of their organists concerning the real abuses which prevailed among the bothous and elepwhere . " beardals and abuses unumerable certainly existed and were eposity financed, and were growing were and worse nowadays, because, owing to the jor is as times and the teaching of mixed serts and preactions, all good works were bring abandoned, and unlaried and contempt for religion was becoming the rustom among high and low. Many thousand livings stood vacant and the people were without belin or recider." . "Where were the actionic and the Dayson is enture? Where the foundations and endownests for the way which had been so nurserous twenty or thirty years up 1." What the Protestante call proclaiming the Word of that is for the meat part, as they then were companie. more mancher and abuse of the Pope and the clergy and a general reviling of mini hand. " The purple has " degenerated into a chair of severality at which foreign notions are muddening." Not many years before Luther had openly exhibited the preachons to descripted the Doke of Beinswick in their agreement as a servent of the devil theware the Archbertop of Mayence and all followers of the Pene. "*

"If we wish to discover the course of the war which is undoubtedly at hard on the Congne do the Carl van der Plamen, who was well acquired with the reads uses in Germany, wrote from the Diet of Worlds, " we must next in mind all that has happened in Germany amore the autquigation of the peneants by the Princes and name equal activestics, all the countless evaluations of man and like he law, of the public peace, of property, give rig sta, earns were and him ur. Let us but rechin up the number ^k "Corp. ref." 4, pp. 450-455; Janeses, "Host, of the German People ' (Engi, Tracu.), 6, p. 152 f.

Jenseen, ibid., p. 264 f
 Ibid., p. 264 f
 Ibid., p. 264 f
 Ibid., p. 264 f Pfarberra wider den Wacher zu predigen," "Merke," Erl. ed., 23, p. 382 ff.

of thurther and mocasterses which have been destroyed and pulaged during them twenty years, and all the accompanying errors and impairty. And to what purpose have these stolen guids how applied ? What has become of all the Church property, all the treasures? . A new religion has been forced upon the people by might and by strategres, and they have been included under threes of pursessment to party on the old arress of God, with its rites and Christian usages. Is this the vaccited freedom of the Coupel, to paracula and everys others, to unpreson them or drive them into exact Averathing that was fermerly reverenced has now falce into contempt, with the run it that right and property are no longer requested, the entires deturbanes in matiers of subgrow have upnet the whole national equishrams, discipline, loyalty and corportability have venished. . . . What many results from west of durgy and schools even in the lands which have remained Catholic . Princes and towns, making their boast of the Gospel, have not been entirhed with introducing the new Church evident into their own territories, but have invaded the Catholic bishoprics and occular dominious and turned everything topicy-turny in arrive to set up their commatitutions. The Schmalka-den confiderates entend their operateens from your to your and grow more and more nations un-At this moment they are actually proaching a war of externanction against the Popu and his adherents. There will be me checking them if the swort of the Empiror a not used to restrain them, as it ought to have been long ago,"1

Another Cashoke contemporary complains in similar fashion : "Religion is percented, all charience to the Empeyor destroyed, justice ant made and increase of all earte everywhere encouraged " The Emperor "has tried many and various means of putting a atop to this insubordination, but all measures have been frustbeen and he must now world in exceed the sword that God put into Jus hands to bring back his and our fatherland to peace, order and unity "1. In the Empirer's own circle the conviction had repeated that as much in justs a had been done to Cathours and an sough determent to the Church, that greed intervention tracthe only source that remained. "Things had come to such a pass in Cormany, ' mad the Imperial Chascoller Granvell to Farmen, the Impel Legate, about the time of the Det of Worms, "that gestion the European's not the Pope's name may longer enryind any weight, indeed it was to be feared that the Protontanta looked upon the opening of the Council as a signal for war, and that they would at once begin to equip themselves not marely for the nake of being ready for any emergency, but rather in neder to appress the Catholics and to make an attack on Italy. the object of their bitter hetred."1

⁵ On May 29, 1545. Jameson, Stud., p. 296 f.

^{*} Bortischer, "Ven Brechtenmerg beit new. Karb V.," 1946 p. 496 F. Jameson, ebol., p. 206.

⁴ M. J. Schmidt, ⁴⁴ Neusen Greek, der Deutschen, ⁵⁵ 1, 1765, p. 23 f. Jermen, ibad.

IV.-- # 0

4. The Literary Opposition

Most of those who opposed Luther in the literary field have already made their appearance in the various episodes narrated in the foregoing pages. In the present section, which is in the anture of a retrospect and amplification of eertain points, we must first touch on the charge frequently put forward by Luther, vis. that it was the furious polemics of his focs which drew from him his violent rejoinders, and, particularly in the earlier part of his career, drove him to take the field against Rome.

We have already repeatedly admitted the too great acramony of some of the writings against Luther, the exasperation they frequently ill conceal and their needlessly strong and insulting language; of this we saw instances in the case of Tetzel. Eck. Priemas. Emser and many others.1

It can, however, readily be proved by a comparison with Luther's own writings, that the champions of the Church fell far short of their opponent, generally speaking, in the matter of violence and contemptuous satire. Luther not only maintained in this respect his supremacy as a speaker, but the small account he made of truths lent an immense advantage to his overwhelming invective. It is also easy to discern a difference in the writings directed against his revolutionary movement, according as they were written earlier or later. At first, when it was merely a question of exposing his theological errors, his opponents were comparatively calm, the first counter theses and the discussions to which they led are replete with the ponderous learning of the Schoolmen, though, even there, we find oceasional traces of the induration felt that the sanctuary of the in th should have been attacked in so wanton a fashion. But after the actual subversion of the Church had begun and the social peril of the radical innovations had revealed itself, the voices of Luther's opponents grow much harsher. Many, in their anguish at the growing evil. do not spare the person of the man responsible for it all. whose own methods of controversy, unfortunately, became a pattern even to his focs. At no time, not even in a warfare such as that then going on, can all the things be justified which were said by Augustine Alveld, Franz Arnoldi, Johann

See above, passem.

See, for instance, above, pp. 94 ff., 102 ff.

Cochleus, Paul Bachmann, Duke George, King Henry VIII and even, occasionally, by Sir Thomas More.

What helped to poison the language was, on the one hand, the coarse tone then generally prevalent amongst the German people, which contrived to find its way into the literary treatment of theological questions to an extent never heard of before, and, on the other, the love of the Humanists for mockery and satire, to which end they ransacked the storehouse of antiquity, classical or otherwise. Among earnest Catholics the most powerful factor was overpowering indignation at the night of such rathless trampling under foot of the religion of their forefathers and of a faith so closely bound up with the greatness of the fatherland and with every phase of life. Their indignation led them to utter things that were less praiseworthy than the feeling which inspired them.

Besides this, there was a great temptation to use, as the best way of testifying to their abhorrence for the opponent of religious truth, that drastic language handed down by past ages, indeed largely borrowed from the Bible, particularly from the Prophets of the Old Testament. Of this, not theological writers only, but even official ecclesiastical documents, had made such hieral use, that scholars had it at their finger-tips. Even in our own day such mediaval thunders are still sometimes heard rumbling, particularly among the Latin races. When dealing with the Bull of Excommunication against Luther, we already had occasion to remark that much in it was due to the aftereffects of the older habits of speech usual in earlier condemnations.1 It may be mentioned of Hadrian VI that in a stern musive addressed in 1522 to Frederick the Elector of Saxony, he denounced Luther as a " serpent " infecting heaven and earth with the venom of its torgue, as a "bour" laying waste the vineyard of the Lord, as a "thirf" who broke m racces the cross of Christ, as a man with "diabolical, impious and postilential lips." He also, in the words of Scripture, tells the Prince that Luther, whom he was protecting, is a deval who has assumed the appearance of an angel of light.

Vol. il., p. 48.
 "Transfiguratur comm te sutanna elle un ancelum lucie." The textin Raymaidie, "Annaice cocles." ann. 1522, n. 72.

As regards the beginnings of the controversy, both series of Theses advanced by Johann Tetrei in 1517 against Luther's attack on the system of indulgences, are exclusively of a technical nature and never even mention by name the originator of the controversy.1

Lather, on the other hand, after the publication of the ninety-five Theses, in his German sermon on Indulgences and Gence, addressed himself directly to the populace. He poured out his scorn on the school-opinions of the theologians and the "bawling" of the envious; they seek, he says, your "pennics," not your souls, and preach for the sate of their "money-box." He appealed very eleverly to their more norded instructs, hinting that the money might be better spent on the poor in their own neighbourhood than on the building of St. Peter's; at the end, sure of his success with the multitude, he abused those who called him a heretic, as "darkened intellects who had never even sniffed a Bible . . . and had never grasped their own teaching."

What was the nature of Tetzel's reply? His " Vorlegung " of the Sermon, being intended for the people, was naturally written in German, but in the wearssome style of the Latin theology of the Schools. In point of matter and logical accuracy it was indeed for superior to Luther's superficialities, but the clumsy German in which it was couched and the number of quotations it berrowed from the Fathers could on y make it distasteful to the reader. It is hardly possible to recognise in its language the popular orator who was such a favounte with the people. The teriousness of his tone contrasts strangely with Luther's airy style. It is easy to believe his honest assurance, that he was ready to submit his views to the judgment of the learned and to the ecclesiastical authorities, and to risk even life itself for the hely Faith of the Catholic past. Only towards the end of the short work, when refuting Luther's twentieth proposition, does Tetzel, not very skilfully, retaliate upon his opponent-though even here he does not name him-for the coarse and abusive language he had used in this thesis. Tetzel says, it would be seen from a consideration of their reasons which of the two it was who had "never sniffed a Bible," never grasped his own teaching and applied to the study of theology "a brain like a sieve"; which of the two was the schismatic, heretic, etc.

Loscher, "Reformationmets," I, p. 484 fl.

^{*} At the end of the second series of Theses ("Luthers Works," Erl, ed., "Opp. lat var.," 1, p. 312) occur the words, "beans, pur mention are great," the nois quotation from that sort of biblion language mentioned above.

^{1 &}quot;Worke" Weim, ed., 1, p. 230 ff.; Erl, ed., 27, p. 4 ff.

In his reply to the "Vorlegung," which he published in his own name under the title "Eyn Freiheyt dess Sermons Bebstlichen Ablass." Luther spared no venom: Sun and moon might well wonder at the light of wisdom displayed by such a poetaster; evidently he had a superabundance of paper and lessure : but his artificial flowers and withered leaves must be scattered to the winds; he had dared to treat " the scriptural text, which is our comfort (Rom. xv. 4), as a sow would treat a sack of oats." His opponent's offer to risk a trial by fire or water for the Faith, he treats with the utmost scorn and dension; "My honest advice to him would be, modestly to restrict himself to the juice of the grape and to the steam that arises from the reast goose to which he is so partial."-Some Protestants have urged that Luther's rudeness of tone, here displayed for the first time, may be explained by his opponent's example. How little this defence of Lather accords with the true state of the case is plain from the above.

As regards Silvester Prieries the matter stands somewhat differently. The "Dialogue," composed by the Master of the Palace in hot haste in reply to Luther's "arrogant Theses on the power of the Pope" (the ninety-five Indulgence Theses he had nailed to the door of the Castle Church at Wittenberg), a work written with all the weighty scholarship of the Schoolmen and criticising each these in detail, contained in its thirty-three octavo pages a number of exaggerations and words calculated to offend.

The lively Southerner was not content with proving that rauch in Luther's Theses was provocative, contrary to dogma, criminal, soductive, saccastic, etc., but, even in the Dedication to Lee X, he starts off by saying that: Luther had dawd to one up against the truth and the Holy See, but that he, the writer, would see whether "his iron nose and brases neek were really unbreakable." Luther preferred to "map secretly" rather than to put forward plant doctrines." If it is in the nature of dogs to snap, then I feel sure you must have had a cog for your father, for you are ever ready to bite." 1. Lather having in one passage put forward a statement that was true, Prieman tells him : " I ou rath a little truth with much that is false, and thus you are a spiritual lever, for you have a syntted skin that shines partly with true, partly with false colours." Referring to the builting of St. Peter a at Rome, he may to Luther rather maliciously: "You biame in the case of the first shurch of Christendom what was extelled when other shurches were being built. Had you received a fat biologica from the Pope with a plenary indulgence for the erection of your church, then, perhaps, you would have found friendly words in plenty and have belauded the indulgences on which now you pour contempt."

 [&]quot; Werke," Worm, ed., 1, p. 340 ff.; Erl. ed., 27, p. 10 ff.
 " Opp. let. var.," 1, p. 340 ff.; Erl. ed., p. 306.

There are larges in style which a high official of the Pope should have known better than to commit.

Not it is clear from Luther's reply that they did not excaperate him nearly to much in this Photian's energy-tic repudiation of his teaching and his calm exposure of the untenable nature of his amortious. What started him was the fact that a highly placed Papal dignitary should have shown the contrast between his innovations and the theology and practice of the Church, be now purceived riently the practical convequences of his undertaking and the direct entanglement it would involve with Rome. Hence the frame of mind in which he composed has " Response. ad Dinlegum," etc. (1518),4 was not due so much to his opponent a personauties as to the whole aspect of affairs, to the slimbiones of his own position and to his flercy determination to win respect for and to further at the express of Rome the new doctrine which he now had ready-made in his mind. Whoever recalls the spirit which breathes in his Commentary on Romann and the violent language found in his corrions and letters even before 1513, will readily estimate at its true worth the statement, that what drove him orwards was the incolored of Provinc-Unlogtunately, Prorus's "Dialogue" shares the fate of the Latin works which appeared in Germany in defence of Cutholitions in the early days of the strugglows. Is Eather: linve by a few theologians, they are never read, and, indeed, even were they read, it is doubtful whether they would be rightly understood encept by those familiar with Scholasticism; hence discretion in passing judgment is doubly necessary.

In the Reply of 1314 now under consideration, Luther, in view of the person and position of his opponent, and of the possible consequences, is more restrained in his abuse than in other writings soon to follow. Yet, anxious as he was to furnish a real answer to the entiresms of an author. so weighty, we find irony rudeness and attempts to render ridiculous the "acrole" objections of the "Thomaster," the "sophist" and all his "taratantara, "intermingled with unwarrantable attacks on "Thomistie" theology, that storehouse whence his opponent purloined "his phrases and his shouting." The reply opens with the words: "Your Dialogue, Reverend Father, has reached me; it is a rather high-flown writing, quite Italian and Thomistic." It also ends in the same vein. "If for the future you don't bring into the arena a Thomas armed with better weapons, then don't expect to find again such consideration as I have just shown you. I have bridled myself so as not to return evil for evil. Good-bye."

Prof. p. 370. * Hat . p 360

^{*} Ibrd., p. 351 * Ibid., 2, p. 1 org.

When, in 1519, the Dominican whom he had thus insulted published, first a " Replies " in the form of a short letter addressed to Luther, and then the " Epitome " (an abstract of his investigations into the theological questions. then under discussion), it was impossible for Luther to complain of any too harsh treatment; the tone of the "Replica," although dealing with Luther's attacks on the person of the Roman scholar, falls immeasurably short of his assailant's in point of bitterness. It is conciliatory, indeed profess an olive branch, should the Wittenberg professor retract the new doctrines which Rome was determined to condemn.1 As for the "Epitome," it is merely a theological review of the doctrines involved, which it clearly states and establishes whilst vigorously refuting all opinions to the contrary. It is accompanied by a grave warning to Luther not to impugn the authority of the Roman Chutch. 1

This was, however, sufficient to let loose the anger of the German Reformer, who meanwhile had advanced considerably, and whose wrath now manifested itself in his rejoinders. Such was his presumption that he actually reprinted in Germany both works of Prierias as soon as they had been published, the "Replica" he introduced with the derisive remark, that, as the author had threatened to give birth to more, they must pray that he might suffer no abortions. His reprint of the "Epitome" in 1520 was accompanied by contemptuous and satirical annotations, and by a preface and postscript where he breaks out into the language already described, about Antichrist seated in the Temple of God in the Roman Babylon, about the happiness of the separated Greeks and Bohemians and about the washing of hands in the blood of the Popish Sodom.³ It was the seething ferment in Luther's own mind, not anything that Priemas had said, that was really responsible for such outbursts. The flood-gates had now been thrown open, and even from the Catholic side came many a wave of indignation to lend acrimony to the contest.

Ibid., p. 68 seq.
 Worke," West, ed. 2, p. 50; "Opp. at, var.," 2, p. 64.

Referring to Luther's words on bloodshed, we hear, for instance, Thomas Murner speaking of "the funous blood-hound, Martin Luther of execrable memory, the blasphemous, runaway monk and murderous bloodhound, who wants to wash his hands in the blood of the priests 1.12

How far Hieronymus Emser allowed himself to go in his hostility to Luther is plain from his first tract, "A venationa Luteriana Ægocerotia assertia," of Nov., 1519, in which he replies to an attack of Luther's on an epistle he (Emser) had sent to Provost Johann Zack. Luther, in the title, had addressed him as the "he-goat" ("ad Ægocerotem") on account of the goat's head figuring in his cost of arms. Emser retorts: "It is plainly beyond your ability to send out into the world any writing of yours that is not replete with houndark fury and bristles, as it were, with cannue fangs. Your father is Belial, the ancestor of all insolent monks." He paints a frightful picture of Luther's career and character the better to prove that such a man had no right to sit in judgment on him.

Luther's "An den Bock zu Leyptzck," dating from the beginning of 1520, was replied to by Emser in his "An den Stier zu Wittenberg," whereupon Luther retorted with "Auff des Bocks zu Leypezick Antwort," to which Emser replied in his pamphlet: "Auff des Stieres tzu Wiettenberg wiettende Replies," and his larger work "Against the Unchristian book of M. Luther to the German Nobility"; this Luther countered by his "Auff das übsrehristlich . . . Buch Bocks Emsers."

During the years 1521-1522 Emser wrote no less than eight tracts against the Wittenberg Professor. The Hamanist and clever man of letters has left therein many a witty

 $^{^{-1}}$ That 6, pp. 328-348=2 pp. 75-108. See the actual words in our volume 12 f. Cp. volume 33h f, for the first interchange of americas between the two champions.

¹ In W. Waltner, "For Luther," p. 216.

page; a refreshing sincenty is one of his characteristics.⁴ On the whole, however, what F. A. Scharpff says applies to these and the later poleraics of this scalous champion of the Church: They "are composed in a tone of violent personality, nor does either combatant seek any longer to restrain the 'Old Adam,' as both at the outset had piedged themselves to do.¹² Another of Luther's earliest literary opponents was Johann Eck, the author of the "Obelisks," on the Indulgence Theses. Like the works of Tetzel and Prierias, this tract is chiefly concerned in a calm discussion of the matter in dispute, though it does not refrain from occasionally describing this or that opinion of Luther's as a "rash, corrupt, impudent assertion," as an insipid, unblushing error, a ridiculous mistake, etc. The severest remark, however, and that which incensed Luther beyond all the rest was, that certain passages in the indulgence Theses, owing to a confusion of ideas, made admissions "containing Bohemma poison," i.e. savouring of the errors of Hus." Subsequent to this Eck, however, wrote to Carlstadt a letter which was intended for Luther, where he says in a conciliatory tone: "To offend Martin was never my intention."4 Noc did he at first print his "Obelisks," but merely sent the tract to his bishop and his friends. Luther, on the other hand, had the work proted in August, 1518, together with his own "Asterisks," and, after circulating them privately among his acquaintances, finally published them together. In the "Asterisei" he speaks of the behaviour of Eck, his quondam "friend," as most insidious and inequitous ("mesdiosassimum inquessmem"), and mocks at his "grand, not to say high-flown," preface. He says: " Hardly was I able to refrain from laughter"; Eck. must have written his "Obelisks" during the Carnival; wearing the mask of genius he had produced a chaos. His

1 " RL.," 41, col 483.

³ "Lather Opp. lat, var," 1, p. 410.

^{*} G. Kawerau (" Hieronymus Emser," 1898. p. 2) remarks that it must be admitted of Emser, "that he was an himsel cumulgeon, average to all subterfuge and pretence, amazingly frank in his admissions concerning blane f, and, is controversy, very risks. Only rarely do we see him departing from this frankness."

^{*} Ibrd., p. 408, in the editor's Introduction to the " Asteroka " and " Obeliaka."

writing adduced nothing concerning the Bible, the Fathers and the Canons, but was all archischolastic; had he. Luther, wished to peripateticise be could, with one puff, have blown away all these musty cobwebs, etc.¹

Johann Eck, who was professor of theology at the University of Ingolstadt and at the same time parish-priest and preacher, enjoyed a great reputation among the Cathones on account of his works against Luther, particularly those on the Primacy, on Purgatory, the Mass and other Catholic doctrines and practices, no less than on account of his printed sermons and his general activity on behalf of the Church.

The indefatigable defender of the Church composed amongst other writings the "Enchandron locorum communium adv. Lutherum et atios hostes eccleum" (1525). The work was of great service and formed an excellent guide to many.

In that well-arranged and eminently practical book the questions then under decate are dealt with for the instruction of Catholies and the confutation of hereties; excerpts from Senpture and from the Fathers are in each instance quoted in support of the Catholic teaching, and then the objections of opposents are set forth and answered. Not only were the Church, the Papal Primary, Holy Scripture, Faith and Works, the Sacraments, the Veneration of the Saints, Induscences, Furgatory and other sumtar points of distrine examined in this way, but even certain postters of deciphor and the evel-mestice-political questions of the day, such as payments to Rome, the ornaments of the thurshes and the egrenomes of Divine Worsh pothe use of Latin in the Mass, the disadvantage of polding disputations with bereties, and even the question of the Turkish war. Hence the work amounted to a small arsenal of weapons for use in the controversal field. The tone is, nowever, not always moderate and displacements. The outbox was clear-sighted enough to avoid the pitfall into which other writers lapsed who cherished under hoper of a settlement by give and take. In much that he save he still speaks from the mediaval startlpoint, for instance, concerning the death penuity due to berefice; this he defends on the strength of the identical passages from the Old Testament to which Lather and his followers appealed for the putting to death of blaspheners and apostates from the true faith.

Eck had the satisfaction of accing his "Encharation," within four years, reprinted four times in Bavaria, twice at Tübingen, and at Cologne, Paris and Lyons. Before 1576 it had been remapressed forty five times. In the midst of his other literary works and his fatiguing labours as preacher and professor at the University of Ingulateds, the scholar never forgot his useful "Sectoridies," but amended it and added to it as occasion demanded. In 1629, in a new edition which he dedicated to Conrad von Thusagers, because of Warsburg, he beds back in the dedicatory preface on the ten years that had persed more has disputation at Leoping, and voices has greef at the assertance advance the growthey had made with the course of time.

Week / Wenn, ed., 1, p. 291; "Opp. lat. var.," 1, p. 411.

"People have outgrown themselves," Eck exciains, "they exalt the nelves against God just as Lucitor once did, but like him too they full into the above and come to despite the teaching of God." "Whoever these not hold fast to the trachion of the Church and to the unarumous coment of the Fathers and the Council must fall into the compost of the worst errors." These words are characteristic of Eck a unwayering adherence to authority.

He goes on to apply this to Luther . " Luther and those who follow him prefer to rue up in their foolish daring rather than how to the rule of faith; they open their offensive mouth against. the hely Fathers and the whole Church; they exalt their own judgreent with momentous and arregant bandines above that of the racet august representatives of the teaching office." Tree enough Luther had begun softly by merely publishing some there against the system of indulgances with which many in ght at il agree; but then he had gone on step by step and had increased his partiesns by proclaiming a Christian freedom wruch in real ty envoyed more of Mohammed. It is our sens, Eck admits, that are the cause of the unhappy success of his work. "From the posioned root new and corrupt shoots are constantly appraging up, and of their new accts we see no end In our unhappy days we have experienced the fury of the iconoclaste. Captures tes have arisen to whom Chrost's presence in the Socrement in a hard saying: Anaboptists, who refuse baptism to chadren but bustow it on adults, and, amongst tixee teachers, every day fresh divisions arise so that the heretics are even more prolific than rabbits. Yes, God is angry with us and allows this became we do not turn to Him with powerful and fervent prayer."

He then goes on to encourage the Bashop of Warnburg to offer vigorous resistance and points modestly to his own self-escribeing Inocurs.

"However much hereav may gain the upper hand, the watchmen of Sion must not keep silence; their voice kinst ring out like a classon against the Philistones who scrift at the heats of the Lord. We must oppose them with all the powers of our mind and defend the Tower of David, guarded, as keep ture mays, with a thousand shields. This, scalous men, equipped with he y learning, have already done. I myself, as the least of all, have also entered the areas and expose d myself to the teeth of the wild beasts. At Lewing I stood up and disputed for twenty days with Luther, the Prince of Dragons, and with Carlstadt; at Baden (in Switzerland, in 1526) ten, I had to suntim a corr last for several days with (Ecolomyadius the Capharnatic, and his comrades. I have also wreatled with them from a distance in several little works which I published in Germany and Italy."

Again, in 1541, in the evening of his days (†1543), in an eighth edition of the "Euclandian" dedicated to Cardinal Alexander Faraces, while taging him to increased efforts for the bringing about of a Council, he could point to his own three-eadtwenty years of meanant conflict with hereby. "O God, " he cries at the sight of the extent to which the evil had grown, "what times are outs?" . "Every bulwark against arbitrary private judgment has been tors down. Lather has taught all how to does all things. Nince he has overtheour the authority of the Councile, the Popes, the Holy Fathers and all the Christian Universities, every man, no matter how mad or has beginned be may be, in free to teach his new fancies to manifold *1

Yet the author weha to revive hope and confidence in his own mind and in that of his Catholic readers, and, to this and, quotes on the inst page the mying of St. Jerome, which he applies to the misfortunes of his own day. "During the years of pomecution the pricute of the Church must tell the faithful holdly and confidently: Your churches will be rebuilt; have no feer, peace and unity will once more enter in .- You truly, by God's Mercy there will come an end to the hereasts of Lether, Zwingh, Gleo-Impague, Biagres, Osander, Schorpf and all their ill., and the olden truth of faith will flourish again. Grant this, Good Josus, and grant it speeddy !" Invocations such as these accord well with the exhortations to pray for the erring which Eck was fond of introducing in this as well as in his other books.

Eck's writings in defence of the faith include learned as well us popular works, and he was also indefatigable in his labours in the minutry.1

Johann Cochieus, who like Eck was one of the more

1 " Enchandion," Ingelist, 1856, f. 167, 167', In the prefatory letter of dedication to Cardinal Farness, Eck expresses himself in his tional manner assume the ill advised attempts of Cathores at media tion i. "He ie poesin profesi morentia Radioponesioa (1541) in amiai fides it planiminum fid from emportation in for that ". In the matter of religious conferences and distributions Ecs. had ripe experience on his side. Though ones very ready to accept a challenge to dispute, he nevertheless wrote lates in the "Enchwidsen" concerning centro-version with heretics: "Harries non guarant disputationem mail modito malifera envocutam. . . Franchidenter obtendunt disputare som curam ductio of liferatio no in theologia exercitatio, and coroni inductio, suspervises forces"; the learned men at the Universities would other wise have already tackled Luther. After mentioning the other dismilitantistics of the disputations he concludes the Catholics regardered witare disputationem cum hassamads " (stad., p. 163 seg.).

* The state of his Ingolstack parish and Eck's pastoral labours have recent y been placed in a clear and favourship light by J. Grewing th for Joseph Leks Playbock, 1908 (Roll Stud. and Toute, famous of Luther's opponents, had a keen and versatile mind († 1552). He first made Luther's personal acquaintance at Worms, and entered the lists against him in 1522 with his "De gratic sacramentorum": from that time forward he kept a watch on all that Luther wrote, so as to be in readiness to reply to or refute it as occasion arose. He himself gives us the long list of his publications against Luther, in his "Commentaria de actir . . . Lutheri." the work in which he sums up his recollections of the struggles of his time.

H(t. 4-3)

From these "Commentaria" of Cochleus, despite the disparaging treatment accorded them by Sleidanus, "more is to be glenned concerning the history of the Reformation than from many bungling Protestant culogies." least, is the opinion of C. Krafft, himself a Protestant.3

The writer sought after the truth and wrote with honest indignation. In spite of disappointments, and even privations, he remained faithful to the Church, making during his career many a sacrifice for his cherished convictions; he himself relates how he could not find a printer for his works against Luther and was forced himself to defray a part of the expense of publication, whereas every press was eager to print Luther's books owing to the demand anticipated.

If, in Cochleus's writings, too great passion is often apparent, this may well have been due to that deprayed humanism and neo-classicism under the influence of which, more perhaps than any other Catholic man of letters, he stood. We have an instance of this in his "Seven-headed. Luther." which he composed in 1529 at Dresden, whither he had been summoned on Emser's death.4 This book, like his later "Commentanes," denotes the climax of his polerues. In the dedication he says that the seven-headed monster could not have been born either of God or of Nature, since neither God nor Nature was capable of such an abortion: rather, it must be an offspring of the evil one. who had deceived man and worked him harm, in Paradisc under the guise of a serpent, and, often later, under the form of fauns, satyrs, Sileni and various enchantments. Africa, according to the ancier ta, there had been a dragon with three or four heads, and Geryon, whom Hercules slew, had also had three heads. But a monster with seven heads, such as was Luther with his sevenfold doctrine, had never been ushered into the world by any country, but must be a creation of the devil. The wicked, perverse, insancapostate monk, long since destined to damnation, had no scruple in deceiving and assailing every upright man with lies, mockery, blasphemy and every kind of nastiness, or in pouring forth seditious falsehoods and insults like an infurnated honess. The seven-headed hoodman, or hooded dragon, was causing all too much confusion in Germany with his seven heads and was polluting it all with his deadly poison. King Saul, he continues, had sinned in not rooting out the people of Amalck. But to whom did the name of Amalek apply more aptly than to the Lutherana? For Amalck's was a bestial nation, living bestially according to the flesh, just as the Lutherans—particularly their idol, viz. this monk with his nun-were now doing. In this mad devil's nun ster not one cramb of any kind of vartue remained, etc.1

Bee above, p. 258.

^{* &}quot;Z, f, preum, Gesch.," 5, p. 451.
* "Bepticops Lutherus, ubique sibi suis scriptia contrarua, in vultationem Saxonicam editus," Dresde, 1529, is para repeated in the "Commentario," 1549, F. 166 C.

Apart from his too rhetorical and acrimonious tone other unsympathetic features met with in Cochleus are his frequent pet tions to high dignitaries of the Churck, in Germany and even in Rome, for material assistance; his complaints that he was not taken seriously enough; his too great engerness, during the first years of the struggle, to hold a disputation with Lather; too much pushfulness and sometimes a certain credulity, not to speak of occasional lapses toto a frivolity which, like his rhetone, recalls the more blatant faults of Humanism and ill beseemed a man anxious to censure the morals of his opponents. He deemed it right and proper, for instance, to write under an assumed name a work against the Reformers' wives and matrimonial relationships, where, in colloquial form and in a manner highly off, asive, he introduces much that was mere tittletaitle and quite without foundation. His authorship of this " Private Conversation " has been proved up to the hilt in recent times.4

N. Paulin, "Katholik," 1894, 2, p. 571 ff.

Among the ranks of the opponents of Lutheranism Johann Faber and Frederick Nausea, both of them bishops of Vienna, hold a high place. The efforts of these two theologians to elucidate controverted points and to refute Luther were much appreciated in the Catholic circles of that day.

In the more popular field quite a number of good speakers and writers belonging to various Heligious Orders, particularly the German Dominicana, distinguished themselves for their seal in the campaign against Lutheranism. Johann Mensing, who became a licentiate at Wittenberg in 1517. and was Luther's best-hated opponent, was a member of the Order of St. Dominie: so also was Augustine von Getelen. of whose sermons the Lutheran preacher Martin Undermark admitted, that, " with his tongue he was able to away. the people as he pleased ";1 Matth as Sittardus, Johann Dietenberger and Ambeosius Pelargus were also all Domnicans, nor did they confine themselves to preaching, but were all of them authors of publications suited to the times. Michael Vehe, another Dominican, was renowned for his abuity to wield the pen in German not less than for his Latin discourses from the pulpit. His brother frag, Johann. Fabri, carned praise as a preachet and as a clever popular writer. The Protestant preacher H. Rocholl wrote of him: "The turn of what he writes gives proof of great eloquence and his language is oratorically fine; his exhortations are also from an homiletic point of view quite excellent.198 Antonius Pirata of the Dominican friary at Constance received the following encommum from Erasmus in a letter to Lauranus: "He is a respected man of good morals and profound learning, who displays in his sermons an eloquence truly wonderful." Conrad Kollin and Jacob Hoogstreaten also adoraed the Dominican Order in Germany at that time with their learning, though their interest lay more in scholastic theology than in popular works.

All the above belonged to the German province of a single Order, and, altogether, quite thirty Dominicans might be enumerated who engaged in controversy with Luther. Amongst the polemists hading from other Orders and deserving honourable mention was the sealous and scholarly Franciscan Caspar Schatzgever, also another Franciscan, Thomas Murner, to whom we shall return immediately, the Augustinian Johann Hoffmeister and the Carmelite Eberhard Billick.2

M. Paulos, "Die deutschen Dominikaner "etc., p. 78,
 Ibid., p. 258.
 Ibid., p. 315.

The reason that the old Orders, with the exception of the Dominicana, did not furnish more controversialists was in great part due to the disastrous effect of the anostasy on their houses. Many of their subjects, dehided by Lutheranism, forsook their cells, and those who remained were frequently exposed to severe persecution, monastenes were not only deprived of their means of subsistence, but, owing to the new spirit of the age and the material difficulties of the monastic life, the supply of novices began to run short.

During this period of the German Church's distress the secular eleggy were not behindhand in furnishing tried combatants, though the influence of the new ideas and the decline in morals, particularly during the preceding thirty or forty years, had brought ecclemantical life and learning to an even lower level than before. There were, however, still some cheering examples to be met with. Conspicuous amongst the veterans who opposed Luther's teaching and innovations, were, in addition to those already mentioned, Michael Helding, auxiliary bishop and preacher at Mayence flater bishop of Merseburg), and Conrad Wimping of Leipzig. and Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, the author of a good Latin eodection of works against Luther entitled "On the sects and errors," etc. (1538).1 The Lutheran cause suffered considerably at the hands of these writers.

Thomas Murner, the famous Alentian preacher and writer, a new Sebastian Brant even mightier than the former, entered the lists against Luther and made full use of the satirical style he had cultivated even earlier. Even Protestants have admitted his principal work against Luther (1522) to be a highly incinive and significant production, whilst a recent editor of his works describes him as the most weighty of Luther's literary opponents in Germany.

N. Paulus, "Schatzgeyer," 1898; "Hoffmasster," 1891; A. Pottina, "Billick," 1901
 J. Negwer, "Conrad Wimpine," Breslau, 1909 (in "KGl. Abb."

^{*} Karl Goedelie, Introd. to his edition of Murner's "Narrenbeschwörung," Leipzig, 1879. Januara, "Hust, of the German People". (Eagl Train,) 11, p. 331,

There is certainly no question of his "wanton, cheerful, nay, bacebantic humour," and of his wealth of caustic from: he enters into Luther's arguments and proofs, and refutes them, more particularly those taken from the Bible. Murner speaks a very simple and pithy language, though not loath to have recourse occasionally to coarse words, of which an example has been given above (p. 876). Luther paid him out by "amusing his readers with an account of the lice on Murner's cowl, and by circulating a lampoon alleged to have been sent him from the Rhine, but, at any rate, printed at Luther's own instance."1

Not one of those who took the field against Luther and pitted their strength against his was really a match for him in energy, in ability to handle the language, in wealth of fancy or in power over the people. To every clear-nighted observer it must have been apparent that truth and logic were on the side of the Catholic controversualists, but, unfortunately, not one of them was able to rival in effectiveness the writings of the Wittenberg Professor.

Here and there, in certain ruder passages, we can easily see how his opponents are clumsily endeavouring to retort upon their readier and more inventive foe in language almost identical with his own. Luther, however, stands alone in the originality of his abuse. But if his adversaries, as was too often the case, overstepped the bounds of moderntion of language, we must bear in mind their pain and indignation at the unspeakable injustice done to the Church of their fathers. In those rude encounters people were only too apt to forget that, according to Christ's command, charity must be displayed even towards those who err. Yet the Church had received as part of her heirloom the injunction set by her Founder against the practice of the Jewish synagogue and its saying, "Hate thy enemy" (Mt. v. 42). "But I say to you: Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that persecute and calumniate you."

It was on principles such as these that, for all his glowing scal for the glory of God, Bl. Pierre Favre (Faber) acted, that gentle and enlightened preacher of the true Catholic reformation, who, since 1540, had been labouring in the Coodekn, ibid.

17.-2 C

dioceses of Spires, of Mavence and of Cologne. It was on these principles that he formed his pifted pupil Bl. Peter Canisius, the first German Jesuit, who completed the Exercises under him at Mavence, and, three years before Luther's death, on May 8, 1543, joined the Society which had now been approved by the Church. Of the followers of the the new religion, Favre expresses himself as follows: "May Jesus Christ, the Saviour of all men. Who knows that His written Word does not suffice to touch the human mind, soften and move their hearts by His divine Grace." " No other arguments promote their conversion better than good works and self sacrifice, even to laying down one's life "I "I never cease grieving," so he wrote to Ignatius, the General of the Order, "at the fall of the noble German nation, once the incomparable pearl of the Church and the glory of Christendom." Through the head of the Society he sought to convince its members that his own way of dealing with the apostasy was the best. "Those who wish to be of service to the false teachers of to-day," he writes, " must above all be distinguished by charity and real esteem. for their opponents, and banish from their minds every thought that might in any way lessen their regard for

When Pietre Favre set about his work for the preservation of the German Church, Luther was already at the heyday of his success. Favre accompanied the Spanish ambassador Ortiz to the religious Conference at Worms in 1540, and to the Diet of Ratisbon in 1541. Those two years bore convincing witness to the fact, that the progress of the innovations could no longer be checked by the authority either of Church or State.

But, before proceeding to examine Luther's work at its zenith, we must scrutinise his doctrine a little more closely.

¹ "Memorade B. Petri Faber," ed. Marc. Bouck, Paris, 1873,

Dan, Bartol, "Opere," 5, Torine, 1825, pp. 110, 116. Cp. B. Dubr, "Gesch, der Jesutten," etc., 1, 1907, 3 ff. Not all the members of the Order to which Favre and Cambin belonged were faithful to Favre a principles in the contriversy against Luther and his teaching, perticularly during the excited potent es of the 17th century. Many, at their own costs, disregarded those laws of urbanity which Bellarmine, for instance, ever respected in his contriversal writings. Such was the case, for austance, with Conrad Vetter, † 1623 (K. A. J. Andrew).

CHAPTER XXVIII

THE NEW DOCMAS IN AN HISTORICAL AND PSYCHOLOGICAL

The Bible text and the Spirit as the "True Tests of Dectrins"

LUTHER'S theological opinions present an attractive field to the psychologist desirous of studying his character. They are in great part, as has been several times shown, the result of his experiences, inward or outward, and appear peculiarly suited to meet his own case. Hence an examination of his doctrines will be of great value, particularly towards an understanding of his inner history.

The spec fically Lutheran doctrine of the Bible as sole judge in matters of faith, i.e. the old, so-called "formal principle" of Protestantism, deserves to be considered first, though, in point of time, it was not the first to be reached by Luther. Actually it was first broached by the author of the schism only when the opposition between his newly discovered views and the Church's teaching determined him to set aside both her claim to act as judge, and all other outward authority on doctrine. Refusing to be bound by the Church, in place of the teaching office with its gift of infallibility, which, according to the behef of the ancient Church, guards the treasure of revelation and therefore also decides on the sense of Holy Scripture, Luther set up as supreme arbiter the letter of the Bible. From this source, so he teaches, the faithful draw the doctrines of the faith, each one according to his ability and enlightenment.

The interpretation of the Sacred Books, in his view, takes place under the illumination of the Holy Ghost, and such an illumination be claimed first and foremost for himself. "Any believer who has better grounds and authority from Scripture on his aide, is more to be believed than the Pope or a whole Council."

^{3 &}quot;Worke," Weim, ed., 2, p. 404 ; "Opp. lat var.," 3, p. 247. Ha refers to Panormitanus, "De elect.," e. Significant.

Liberty for the Examination of Scripture and Lather's Autonomy.

Lather only gradually reached his teaching concerning the supremacy of Holy Scripture.

His examination at Augsburg drew forth from him his first statements on this nabject. In the postscript to his own report of the interview he places. Hely Scripture first amongst the theological sources, adding that it was morely being corrupted by the so-colled secred Decrees of the Church, I m he account to the Council he also places the Bible and its decision (a c. his suterpretotion) above the Pops. Byen then, however, he adjusted the nuthority of the Council only by ands with that of the Bible only in so far as he confidently looked to the Council for a decision in his favour. The fact that about this time he innered he could descry Anachmst in the Pose reveals at once the ende gulf he was acoust to create between all enclosurateral authority and Respires prevately interpreted - Without having as yet formally proclaimed the new principle on Holy beripture, he nevertheless declared at the Larguig Deputation, that Scripture ranhad above a Council * and that Usumenical Councils had already erred in matters of faith. Only when driven into a corner by his defrace of the herey of Hus, and after frustiess evasions, were these admissions wrong from him by Eck. Any light thus thrown on the matter by the Catholic speaker was, however, at once obscured by the following ambiguous cinque added by Lather: " Councile have greed, and may are, particularly on prints which do not appertain to faith."

Immediately after the Leipzig Disputation, in a letter addressed by himself and Carletadt to the Elector, Luther lays it down that "a layrean with the Scripture on his nide is more to be believed in than the Popo and a Council without Scripture.4 There, in the * Remintiones super propositionship Lapoist disputation," he gives uttersive to an assortion behind which he areks to shelter his views . " Faith does not originate in authority

Ibid., p. 285 = p. 75.

* I to d., p. 1666 p. 97 seg. 2. "Conceleum aliquando errasos, prasertim to see quez non aust fidel," . Up. the following ; " gracelierus statute to ² " Worke " Weim, ed., 2, p. 18 ff, p. " Opp. Int. var.," 2, p. 366 eq.

un que auni files, aunt omnimoto amplectenda

Letter of Aug. 18, 1519; ' Briefe," 1, p. 315; "Works," Ect. of., 53, p. 19 (Briefwechsel," 2, p. 12). At Worms in 1521 he had declared in this same sense, that he would not submit, " use considue fuces tentimonise acregiuscurum unt intione evidente ; num neque pupu hoque concilirs solia circle, cum constrt cos el errasec seguns el sela igeis centradecime — victus aum acrigituria a mie adductio d'edipla comocientia in verbio Dec." Werke," Wenn, ed., 7, p. 883; ep. p. 853. He writes emphatically in reply to King Henry VIII (see p. 301): "Eye were edecrater data putrum, homenum, augustium, decrease per perantiquems usum, non multitudinens honsinum, and union moderates externes excloses associations, ... Des verbiens ent asper amma." ⁶ Worke, ⁸ Wester, etc., 10, 2, p. 214 f., ⁹ Opp. let. vor., ⁹ 6, p. 437.

but is produced in the heart only by the Holy Chost, though man is indeed moved to faith by word and example."1

Yet, as shough he himself wished to demonstrate the penis his new principle involved, not merely for the interpretation of the bible but even for the integrity of the Sacred Books, he makes in the very same writing, on ostensibly istrinsic grounds, his famous osciaught on the Epistle of St. James which had been proped against him. Became this canonical Finate tells against his doctrine of Justification, he will have it that, "its style is for beneath the dignity of an Apostle and is not to be compared with that of Paul." Already at the Leiping Disputation he had attacked the second Book of the Machabees, which did not suit his views, again for intrinsic reasons and because it ran counter to true doctrine; the Church had indeed admitted it into the Canon, but " she could not muse the status of a book per impart to it a higher value than it actually possessed."3

From that time forward Luther gives the most varied expression to the principle of the free interpretation of Scripture: He declares, that the Bible may be interpreted by everyone, even by the " humble miller's maid, nay, by a child of nine if it has the faith."4. " The sheep must judge whether the pastors teach in Christ's own tone," " Christ alone, and none other than the Crucified, do we acknowledge as our Master. Paul will not have us believe him or an angel (Gal. 1. 8, 12) unless Christ lives and speaks in him." He is at pains to inform "the senseless Sophists, the unlearned bishops, monks and priests, the Pope and all his Gomorrhas " that we were baptised, not in the name of any Father of the Church, "but in the name of Jesus Christ."*

"That a Christian assembly or congregation has the right and the power to judge of doctrine and to appoint and dismiss preachers" is the title of one of Luther's writings of 1523.7 Later we meet the downright declaration: "Neither Church, nor Fathers, nor Apostles, nor angels are to be listened to except so far as they teach the pure Word of God (* nisi afferant et doceant purum verbum Dei *).

In his bias against his foes he does not pause to consider that the very point at issue is to discern what the " pure Word of God " is, for, where it exists, any opposition on the 7 Hada, 11, p. 406 ff. – 22, p. 141 ff.

³ ¹⁴ Warhe, ¹⁸ Weim, ed., 2, p. 429; ¹⁴ Opp. lat. var., ¹⁷ 3, p. 267. ³ Jbrd., p. 224=p. 121, Hed., p. 425 - p. 278.
 Werke," Weim. ed., 10, 2, p. 259 j Eri ed., 16, p. 446.

Ibid., 11, p. 409 – 22, p. 143. Had, 8, p. 484 f. = 28, p. 43.

In lim * Corn on Ep. acl. Galatas," 1, p. 104.

part of "Church, Fathers and Apostles" is surely inconceivable. It is merely an echo of his early mystic theories when, in a dreamy sort of way, he hints, that the pure Word manifests itself to each believer and reveals itself to the world without the intervention of any outward authority. It was clearly mere prejudice in his own favour which led him to be ruled by the one idea that the "pure Word of God" was to be found nowhere but in his own reading of the Bible.

How greatly he allowed himself to be decrived by such fancies is already apparent in Luther's carliest known statements on Serioture at the very beginning of the public controversy. His devotion to Biblical study from his youth, and the academic laurels he had won in this branch of karning, led him, consciously or not, to find in himself an embodiment of Holy Scripture. Only in this way can we explain his strange language concerning the Bible in his "Eyn Freiheyt dess Sermons" against Tetzel. Here, at the very commencement, instead of setting quietly about his task, which was to defend his new interpretation against the tradition, objected by his opponent, he sings prean in praise of the unassailable Divine Word. "All who blaspheme Scripture with their false glosses," he writes, "shall perish by their own sword, like Goliath (1 Kings xvii, 51), . . . Christ's doctrine is His Divine Whence it is forbidden, not only to this blasphemer [Tetzell, but to any angel in heaven, to change one letter of it. For it is written: 'God does not deny what He has once said, Job xiii. [xiv.], and in the Psalter [exvia. 89]: * For ever, O Lord, Thy word standeth firm.' Not a jot or tittle of the most insignificant letter of the law of God shall pass; everything must be fulfilled."1 Here Tetzel becomes a rude ass, " who brays at Luther," reminding the latter of a "sow" that defiles the venerable Scripture.

How uncalled for his emphatic words quoted above on the value of the Bible really were can be more readily perceived now from a distance; for his opponents' externand that of the Church generally for the Word of God was ecrtainly not behind his, whilst the Church provided a safeguard for Holy Scripture which Luther was unwilling to admit. But in those days, in the midst of the struggle, such praises showered by Luther on Holy Writ served to make people think—not at all to his disadvantage—that he was the herald and champion of the Bible, which the Popish Church did not reckon at its true worth, whereas, all the while, he should have been striving to show that his contentions really had the support of Scripture. Even later his misleading cry was ever: Back to the sacred stronghold of the Bible! Back to the "true, pure and undefiled Word of God!"

P. Ded. p. 385 13.

¹ "Werke" Weim, ed., 1/p. 383 f.; Erl, ed., 27/p. 11.

"Thy Word is the Truth" was his habitual battle-shout, though about this there had never been the least dispute.

"Against all the sayings of the Fathers," he says in 1522 in his reply to King Henry VIII, "against all the arts and words of angels, men and devils I set the Scriptures and the Gospel. . . . Here I stand and here I defy them. . . . The Word of God I count above all else and the Divine Majesty supports me; hence I should not turn a hair were a thousand Augustines against me, and am certain that the true Church adheres with me to God's Word." "Here Harry of England must hold his tongue." Harry would see how Luther "stood upon his rock" and that he, Harry, "twaddled" like a "silly fool."

Experience given by the Spirit.

The "rock" on which Luther's interpretation of the Bible rests is a certain inward feeling and perception by the individual of the Bible's teaching.

In the last resort it is on an inward experience of having been taught by the Spirit the truth and meaning of the Divine words that the Christian must firmly take his stand. Just as Luther believed himself to have passed through such an experience, so, according to him, all others must first reach it and then make it their starting-point.

This is the Spirit from on High that co-operates with the Word of Scripture.

'Each man must believe solely because it is the Word of God and because he feels within that it is true, even though an angel from heaven and all the world should preach against it." We must not regard the "opinion of all Christendoin" but "each one for himself alone "must believe the Scriptures." "The Word stack must content the heart and embrace and some a man and, as it were, hold him captive till he feels how true and right it "."

¹ Ibid , 10, 2, p. 256 f. = 28, p. 370 f.

^{*} Ibid., p. 90 = 3.0. "Von Menschen leren tzu meyden," 1522.

"Hence every Christian can learn the truth from Scripture," as a present-day Protestant theologism describes Luther's theologism describes Luther's theologism describes Luther's theologism school of interpretation, but the plain scene of Scripture and the experience of his heart suffice." He adds: "This might of course draw down upon Luther the charge of subjectivism." "What Luther said of the 'whisper' of the word of forgiveness is well known. Thus [according to Luther] God can, when necessary, work without the use of any means." Thanks to the "whisper" the Bible becomes a sure guide, "for [according to him] the Holy Ghost always works in the heart the self-ame truth." "From the peculiar reagants standpoint of his own experience of salvation," Luther, so the same theologism adm to, determined his "attends towards Scripture." In this we have one of the results of his "personal experience."

"How it comes to pass," says Luther, "that Christ thus enters the heart you cannot tell, but your heart feels plainly, by the experience of faith, that He is there indeed "* "When the Holy Chost performs His office then it proceeds "* "No one can rightly understand God or the Word of God unless he receives it directly from the Holy Ghost."

When his friend Caristadt, together with whom Luther had at first insisted on Scripture only, later struck out a path of his own in doctrine and ecclesiastical practice while continuing to appeal to Scripture and to his own enlightenment, even the controversy with him and the "fanatics" failed to make Luther relinquish in theory his standpoint concerning the Bible and the Spirit as the one source and rule of faith. He became, however, more cautious in formulating it and endeavoured at least to leave a back door open. He was less insistent in his assertion that the Spirit matructed, by the inward Word, each one who read the

* Ibid. p. 90 = 341 Nee below, Lather's decial of the Augustician "Non-crederem evangelio," etc.

* "Werke "Wenn ed 19, p. 489; Erl. ed , 29, p. 334 "Bermon von dem Secrement," 1524.

Otto Scheel, Luthers Stelling zur Heiligen Schrift," Tübingen, 1992 (Sami ibng geneinverstand! Virtrage und Schriften aus dem Griset der Theel und Rts., No. 29) p. 38 on p. 37 the last quotation is also given with an incorrect reference) and p. 41 f.

^{4 &}quot;Werke" Weins, ed., 15, p. 565: "Quod est eius opus? Quod drive into the heart predicentenem Christ, qui non fails. Christ failed, qui mudio predicentrit et nihil effecit; Spiritus soncius present the world to rue... Si etiam a la minul thousand verbum producane, midd for a , com Speritus sencius hec sucm officiam facit, tum it makes its way."

BIBLE TEXT AND THE SPIRIT 898

Scriptures: so much the more did he emphasise the supposed "clearness of the outward Word," viz. the Bible, and deprecate any wanton treatment of it (by anyone save himself); at the same time he began to lay stress on the outward side of the Church, on the preaching office and the administration of the Socraments 1. The lanatics he reproves for "merely gaping at the Spirit in their hearts," whereas the outward articles must necessarily precede this a At times what he says almost looks like a repudiation of his earlier theory of enlightenment through the Spirit; for instance, when he describes how the fanatics wait " till the heavenly voice comes and God speaks to them." Now, the outward Word of the Gospel, proclaimed by men truly "ealled," is to be the guiding star amidst the muschief wrought by the acctamana; this outward Word, so he now fancies, will surely avail to decide every issue, seeing that it is so clear; only by dint of juggling could the sense of the Bible, as manifest in the outward Word, he distorted; looked at fairly it at once settled every question-needless to say in Luther's favour; to understand it, all that was needed was the "natural language," the "Lady Empress who far excels all subtle inventions."4

As to the alleged clearness of the word of Scripture it is sufficient to recall that he himself indirectly challenged it by accusing the whole Church of having misunderstood the Bible, and to consider the abyss that separated his interpretation, even of the most vital texts, from that of the scholars of the past, "Though we had the Bible and read it," he says, " yet we understood nothing of it." Nevertheless he fancied he could save his theory by appealing to the clearness of the text and the assistance rendered by a knowledge of languages. "St. Paul wills" (1 Cor. xiv. 29), so Eather says, is a writing on the schools, " that Christians should judge all doctrine, though for this we must needs be acquainted with the language. For the preacher or teacher may indeed read the Bible through and through as much as he chooses, but he will sometimes be right and sometimes

<sup>Cp. above, vol. iñ., pp. 12 fl., 398.
Werke, Weiro, ed., 18, p. 181; Ed. ed., 29, p. 240.
Ibut, p. 137=200 ("Wulder die hymelischen Propheten").
Do you see how the devit, the enemy of diving order, opens his mouth.</sup> wrong, if there he no one there to jurige whether he is doing it well or ill. Thus in order to judge there must be skill or a knowledge of tongues, otherwise it is all to no purpose,"1

But above all, as he impresses on the reader in the same tract, he is mostly had thrown light on the Bible by his knowledge of languages; his interpretation, thanks to the " light" of the languages, had effected " such great things that all the world maryels and must confess that now we have the Gospel almost as pure and undetiled as the Apostles had it, that it is restored to its pristine purity, and is even more undefiled than at the time of St. Jerome or Augustine." His willingness, expressed from time to time, to submit himself or any other teacher to the judgment of anyone powersed of greater learning and a more profound. spiritual sense, attracted many enlightened minds to his party,*

Luther's self-contradiction in speaking, first, of the great elearness of the Bible, and then of its great obscurity, cannot fail to strike one.

* Ibid., p. 49 - 184

[!] Bud We med 15 p 42, Frt od 22 p 187, "Andie Radberrei. aller Stedle deutsches Länds, dan die christliebe Schulen auffrichten und halten wilen," 1924.

At the German Protestant Congress at Berlin in 1904, Dr. Max Feether of Berlin appealed to the above writing of Lather's as a proof that the latter had reling usbed has sless of the Bible being in the hands of each individual the sub-estree of distribute. If That this, as a foundafrom of all doctrine, is in possible in Protestantism " he said, speaking from his standpoint, " has long been admitted, and we have supply to hour as most how Protoscant the logy has come to cananine freely not only the contents of the Hole, but the Bible treff. Theology has no zaghtwother than those enjoyed by any other bewich of worldly learning " In the sequel the writer declared familif against the Decimity of Chast and any not system of doctrine. According to him particular doctrines. even those of the Apostles' Creed, were of no importance. " He has all the faith required who makes has faith for himself." (See the report of the discourse in the "Köln. Volkozing.," 1904, No. $34.) We may compare this principle with Luther's own on freedom. The some principles were recently invoked in the case of the Protestant Pastor Jatho of Corsgos, whon he was charged with being an unbeliever. On his disrapsed from office his friends declared that " a short had been riveted on free and unbiased research in Prusuan Protestantism, and that the official representatives of Protestantism host banned that spirit of personal Christianity which once had intepolled Lather to neil up his These to the door of the Castle church at Wittenberg " ("Koli. Zing.," 1911, No. 712; ep. 4 Köln. Vollesting.," 1411, No. 545.) During too trial Jatho, too, had appealed to his " inward experience" and personal knowledge. (" Köin, Volkaring ," 1911, No. 592 p.

BIRLE TEXT AND THE SPIRIT 895

"Whoever now wants to become a theologian," he says, for instance, " enjoys a great advantage. For, first, he has the Bible which is now so clear that he can read it without any difficulty," "Should anyone say that it is necessary to have the interpretation of the Fathers and that Scripture is obscure, you must reply, that that is untrue. There is no book on earth more plainly written than Holy Scripture, in comparison with all other books it is as the sun to any other light "3 Elsewhere he says: " The ungodly sophists [the Schoolmen) have asserted, that in Holy Scripture there is much that is obscure and not yet clearly explained." but according to him they were not able to bring forward one vestige of proof; " if the words are obscure in one passage, they are clear in another," and a comparison makes everything plain, particularly to one who is learned in languages.1 -Thus the Bible, according to a further statement, is " clearer, easier and more certain than any other writing "a " It is an itself quite certain, quite easy and quite plain, it is its own explanation; it is the universal argument, judge and enlightener, and makes all clear to all."4

Later, however, the idea that Holy Scripture was obscure preponderated with him. Two days before his death Luther. wrote in Latin on a piece of paper, which was subsequently found on his table, his thoughts on the difficulty of understanding Scripture: "No one can understand the Bucohes of Virgil who has not been a herdsman for five years; nor his Georgies unless he has inhoured five years in the fields. In order to understand anght the epistles of Cicero a man must have been full twenty years in the public service of a great State. No one need fancy he has tasted Holy Scripture who has not ruled Churches for a hundred years with prophets like Elias and Eliseus, with John the Baptist, Christ and the Apostles "4. In all likelihood his experiences. with the sertaments in his own camp led him towards the end of his life to lay more stress on the difficulty of understanding the Bible

Even with the "plain, and Scripture" and a clear brain.

¹ "Werke," Weim ed. 8, p. 236; Erl. ed., 39, p. 133.

^{*} Ibid., Wenn. ed., 18, p. 606 = "Opp. lat. var." 7, p. 124 "De nervo arbitmo."

Ibid. 7 p. 317 24, p. 58.
 Ibid. 7 p. 97 "Opp. lat. var." 5, p. 161
 Ibid., Erl. ed. 57 p. 6, Table Talk

it may easily happen, as he says, to a man to fall into danger through the Bible, by looking at it from "his own conceit," as "through a painted glass," and "seeing no other colour than that of the glass."1 Such people cannot then be set right, but become "masters of heresy." All heresy seems to him to come from Seripture and to be based on it. There is no heretic, he says in a sermon in 1528, who does not appeal to Scripture; hence it came about that people called the Bible a heresy-book. The "heresy-book " was a favourite topic with him. Two years earlier he had used the expression twice on one day, and in 1525, when complaining in a segmon that the fanatics decked themselves out with Scripture, he said: "Thus it is true what people say, viz. that Holy Sennture is a heresy-book, i.e. a book that the hereties claim for themselves; there is no other book that they misuse so much as this book, and there has never been a heresy so bad or so gross that it has not sheltered itself behind Scripture." These preachers from among the fanaties, he says, boast of the voice of God and of the Spirit, but they were never sent; let them prove by miracles their Divine mission !*

Thus he had retracted nothing of his strange doctrine concerning private enlightenment; on the contrary, when not actually dealing with the scetarians, he still declared with that persistence of which he was such a master and which shrank from no ack-contradictions, that the Spint alone taught man how to understand the Senptures, now that man, owing to original sin, was quite unable to grasp even the plainest passages. " In it [the Bible] not one word is of so small account as to allow of our understanding it by reason." Only by virtue of the higher light by which he understood Scripture could a man "impartially prove and make the different sourits and their doctrines." he wrote in his " De servo arbitrio" at a time when he had already engaged upon the struggle with the "Heavenly

² "Werke," Werm, ed., 23, p. 75; Erl, ed., 30, p. 22.

Sermon of Aug 2, 1526, "Werks," Werm, ed., 27 p. 287

^{*} On Dec 23, 1526 he said in his afternoon surmon, speaking of the sermon that morning. * Hadre dirt, billio case harcones librios." Worke," We in. ed., 16, p. 624. And as a matter of fact the notes contain the passage, shid 20, p. 588

* "Worke," Weam, ed., 17, I, p. 368. * "Bird., p. 360.

* "Worke," Ed. ed., 155, p. 144.

BIBLE TEXT AND THE SPIRIT 897

Prophets." And to these principles he remained faithful till death without, however, as a Protestant scholar repeatedly points out of the several sides of Luther's theology, "explaining more clearly" their relation to the difficulties involved.

Concerning the inward Word or the enlightenment by the Spirit some words of Lather's in 1581 may be given here.

In that year he preached on the Gospel of St. John. He dwelt at some length on his favourite passage : "Whoever believeth in Me hath everlasting hie," and its context. Here, speaking represently of the outward and the inward Word, he insets represaily on the fermer and particularly on the hearing of termore with faith, though so far was he from relinquishing the anward Word that he combines it in a strange way with the outward, and finally arrives once more at his earlier put idea. Whoever is taught inwardly by the Spirit is fees to judge and doesdo on all things.

"The Lord Christ intends," so he explains, " that we should hold first and remain by the outward, spoken Word, and thereby He has put down reason from its cost, to has reputiated the objections of the fanation who defered from him. Christ, according to Luther, exhorts us "diagently to beten to and learn the Word "* The begrining of Justification is in this, that "God penclasus to you the spoken, outward Word 1. To this end Good has His removingure and viours. " When you hear a sermon from St. Paul or from ma, you hear God the Father Himself; yet both of un, you and I, have one schoolmaster and doctor, via. the Fether . . , only that God speaks to you through mo." Here he does not enter into the question of his mission, though he shows plainly enough that he was not going to be set aside. God mant give the quiken Word, " "atherwise it does not make its way. But if you are set on helping yourselves, why then should I preach ? In that sase you have no need of ma. . . . We Notes of the Sermon published in 1564.

* Ibed., p. 161 = 367; cp. p. 165 = 371. P. 148=354.

[&]quot;With reference to the Lether declares ("De servo arbitrio"): In the words of Scripture which he agen to up and all the world no one, owing to the darkening of the mind in able to discore the smallest ictaon long on he has not the Spirit of God, no one possesses the most sense or the true amoriesty requires: I note here a certain out with cognoccumi "-mo one believes that God exists and that he is His erenture. For him the sud-corn sutrems, in the Christian who has attained to the tean light and his salvation through the Spirit of Gid, consists in being able to test with certainty all doctrines and beliefs (1 the st. 15). This individual judgment is essential for every Christian and for his faith; it does not, however, profit others: For them the "extreme substime" is intended, which is exercised by the preaches of the Word." Köstlin, "Luthers Theol.," 12, p. 380.

* World Worm. ed. 13, p. 145; Est. ett., 47, p. 353. From may be angered and stutwfied over it" (viz. at the apparent divergence between the Word of God and reason), yet we must listen and weigh "the Word that is preached by the lips of Christ."

Excellent as this exhortation may be so far as St. Paul was concerned, the speaker is at no pains to supply his bearer with any proof of his own esying, vis. " that God speaks to you through He insists upon it, however, and now comes the intervention of the Spirit: God must "impire the conviction that it m His Word "I which has been heard. "Without the Word we must not do snything, but must be taught by God."* "When the heart can feel assured that God the Father Himself is speakang to us [when we listen to a sermon], then the Holy Ghost and the light enters in , then man is enlightened and becomes a happy master, and is able to decide and judge of all doctrine, for he has the light, and is them the Divine Word, and fees certain. within his bresst that his doctrine in the vivry Word of God." When you "feel this in your heart, then account yourself one of the disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ, and you will allow Him to be Master and surrender yourself to Him. In this way will you be saved."

The real breathing of the Spirit of God, however, confirms the atterances only of the "preaching office," viz. Luther's and the Lutherans. This he proclaims in the following words: "The true breathing and inspiration of the Holy Ghost is that which is wafted through the preaching office and the outward Word."

In what follows, for the better understanding of Luther's attitude towards the Bible, we shall examine two consequences of his subjective ways, vis. their effect on the inspiration and the Canon of Scripture, and the exceptical disagreement which was the result of the principle of inward experience, also the means he chose to remedy it.

Inspiration and the Canon of Scripture.

In the matter of the inspiration of Scripture Luther never went so far as the faratical enthusiasts of later Lutheranism, who, in their systems, taught an actual verbal inspiration, according to which the writers of the Bible had not merely been impelled, enlightened, and infallibly preserved from error, but had received every word from God. On the contrary, owing to his wanton handling of the Bible, he takes the inspiration of its writers so widely and vaguely that the very idea of inspiration is practically

P. 146, 354
 P. 148, 356.
 P. 148

299

evaporated. The Bible is indeed, according to him, an outcome of the inspiration of God and is the writing and Word of the Holy Chost (" Spiritus auctor set libre"),1 and may accordingly be described as "the Holy Ghost's own especial book, writing and Word "-which he sometimes explains almost as though he had been a believer in verbal inspiration.2

The fact is, however, that he sees "in the sacred writers no other form of spiritual illumination than that displayed in the verbal preaching of the Divine witnesses." "Moreover we occasionally find him questioning whether in certain passages the Holy Ghost . . . is really so unquestionably present as in other parts of Scripture." The truth is " he never formulated any detailed theory of Scriptural inspiration. With Luther the action of the Holy Ghost, on the witnesses of both Old Testament and New, is always one and the same, whether they proclaim the Word verbally or by writing; nowhere do we meet with the thought that they were under the influence of any other inspiration when they wrote,"4

The freedom he allowed himself, no less in the matter of inspiration than in the principle of the Bible only, explains the distinction he so often makes between the character and importance of the various parts of the "Word of God," which he will have one keep in view when searching in Scripture for the truths of faith. In passages where religion is not concerned, particularly in historical statements, he believes that the tools of the Holy Ghost both could and did err. He thinks that "the predictions of the prophets concerning the Kings and secular affairs often turned out wrong "4 The inspiration of the Apostles (and Evangelists) in the New-Testament writings was merely a part of their general "office," not a " special inspiration " in the nature

U "Opp lat, exeg ," 7, p. 313, "Energ in Gence."

[&]quot; Werke," Erl ed. 63, p. 415, in the Preface to the second part of the first complete edition of his works (compiled from his writings).

Köstlin, sbid., 29, p. 36.

^{*} Kostin, soid and p. 15, 30. * Ibid, p. 35.

* Cp. "Werke," Erl. ed., 8', p. 23 f., where Luther says, the predictions of the prophets (or of the Apocalypse) concerning wars, the Kisics, etc., were "things pressing to the inquisitive..., but were unnecessary prophecies, for they neither taught nor furthered the Christian faith"; in these prophecies "concerning Kings and worldly events" the Prophets had "often been wrong."

LUTHER THE REFORMER 400

of a "second power added to and independent of it." "The predominant importance of the Apostles he traces back to their general inspiration in the sense described above."1

Catholic doctors before Luther's day had showed themselves far more leakous of the sacredness of the Bible, as regards both the idea of inspiration and the equal value of all the books, and their every part. In spite of this Luther would have it that he had been the first to make the Bible respected.

One point descrying of consideration as an instance of Luther's wantonness is his attitude towards the Canon of the Sacred Books.

How was he to prove that this or that book was to be included amongst the writings which constituted the Word of God, now that he had rejected the testimony of ecclesiastical tradition? According to the teaching of the ancient Church, it was tradition and the authority of the Church which vouched for the canonical character of the books of the Bible. Luther was confronted with this objection by Johann Eck at the Leipzig Disputation, who quoted the well-known words of St. Augustine, that he was compelled "to believe the Gospel only on the authority of the Catholic Church."2 No longer recognizing the authority of the Church, Luther met the objection by some strange evasions.* When at last he saw that no other meaning could be read into the passage he threw it overboard and wrote: " If this meaning be not in St. Augustine's words then it were better to repudiate his saying. For it is contrary to Scripture, to the Spirit and to all experience.4 Even for the inspired value of the books areluded in the Canon he appealed in his arbitrary fashion, not to the infallible Church, but to the "inward testimony of the Spirit."

He could hardly escape being thus thrown back on this inward, mystical attestation, seeing that, according to him, human reason is of little assistance in the matter. Here the "inner sense" has to come in and, just as under the [&]quot;Contra epistolam fundamenti Maniclaserum," c. 5.

¹ Thus O. Scheel (above, p. 392, n. 1), p. 67 f.

^{3 &}quot; Les vero evenycha non crederem, neu me catholica ecclena com-

"Worke," Weim, ed., 2, pp. 429-432; "Opp. let. var.," 3, pp. 284-288. "Resol super propon Lipstennes."

"Worke," Weim, ed., 10, 2, p. 90, Let ed., 28, p. 441.

illumination of the Spirit of God, it imparts certainty concerning the meaning of the Bible, so also it discerns the dignity and godly value of Scripture. For obvious reasons, here again, he fails to favour us with any "clearer explanation" of his theory. One thing, however, emerges clearly, vis. that the feeling of certainty regarding both the meaning and the contents is practically identical with the feeling that the writing in question is Divine; since the Spirit from on High teaches me the truth which lies in the sense of Scripture, so also it must teach me that it is Scripture; the apprehension of the sense and of the Divine character of the secred pages is one and the same.

It is thus that Luther clothes in intengible, mystical language the vital question of religion here involved; at the Leipzig Disputation he had used terms no less clusive: Every book that really belongs to the Canon has authority and certainty "per se ipsum." His mystical words were the outcome of deep-scated tendencies within him; Tauler's language, which Luther had so skilfully made his own, was to assist him in concealing the obscurity and lack of logic inherent in his views.

In reality, nevertheless, like the Catholics, he accepted the Canon of Holy Scripture as handed down by antiquity; only that he granted to the subjective influence of the "testimony of the Spirit" a far-reaching and destructive force. He arbitrarily struck out of the Canon quite a number of authentic writings, which will be enumerated elsewhere together with his statements concerning them.

According to Keetlin ("Lathers Theof.," 2°, p. 10 ff., it was only the orthodox Latherana after his day who developed this into the doctrine of the "testimonium Spenius Scotti," which assures every reader of the canonicity of the books of the Pible. In reality, however, Lather himself already stood for this "testimonium." Thanks to it be judged of the relative apportance of the Secret Books and only "allowed himself to be determined by the spirit speaking to him out of them." Thus Koutlin himself, 1°, p. 319.

^{*} Works," Weize, ed., 2, p. 525; "Opp. let. ver.," 3, p. 131.
* Non potest ecclesis plus tribuers suctordates and ferminate there, quarte per se speam detect." The question, however, was who was to attest this authority.

^{*} See our vol. v., xxxiv., 3

^{*} O. Schrot inbove, p. 392, m. 2), p. 47, after having instanced Luther's adverse existence of the Epostle of St. James and the prophetical books, remarks. * He took exception to the Epostle of Jude, to Hebrews and to the Apocalypes. The Book of Esther deserved no place in the Canon any more than the second Book of Machabese, though the first was worthy of concensation. [It was, so Lether says

402 LUTHER THE REFORMER

His literary opponents had a right to represent to him that no "atrange and arbitrary "" a proceeding was mreely a result of his theory that the mered busin must prove their us the Profess to his German translation of it. Est ed. 83 p. 1041. not properties of being perioded amongs the airend westings of the Between themse in he hertery or Arterbup & given up a purious of the Init of Me real Assessment and Property | Lecture tenters a cine portion seem between the books to does not impage. 14 the Faul of writings he given the first poper to findings, not us to places it. I don't first seeing the tempers. He enteress the associates from tagter becomes they proved the worse and decimal three and not the province of mak terremoves by group ". By twelf review up 49.7 g. shat Leature a set contintion based, not an inarried but areal arguments but on the tre going Storouten." these distance mappened, has on the dubrect in which they pagest price of present to his doctrine as on amond considers. The fact that the bounts of Jaron agenticiting of them. and Justification in grace was ground mough for Lather to resect it. Analogous is the case of his case to be the Rebress. From all the tip expent her port Lutter percei require retains in the Everywheat and what reconstant or providers by attached to historical He cape hitle abother a warrey in apparedment and when he waste to have so whether its convents agree with what he has previously to to the horse of firstplays. He did not even abrush from inquigning the nationally of the hyperton in fax of all higher p. 52). No level there draws with the phytograph to prove by longplus to Lattice made by J. Russier (.) toute marget bed benealt and Touteste sitem. Leaps at 1800 pp. 319. 21, and H. Presan (. Die Recture along from history principle for Lie for his our bespecies Proposts. to man $ 66 Ch. the questioner of the properties of best Largery 1991 p. 19 Brengages hardly agrees. Kippen ness derive that the effect of the responsal destroys of expendence appears at all in Littles . For being that the Apostro spear by the H is takent about that he above should with the doctrine of apparetion in the encurrer and heriotical elege-True two agts that are interest p. 00-6, in 1) memor prior effects of that foot our specific less the quantum in the wines, where of trees were compatible to the the uniform theory of Remotives which he from in Leaters. Un tie auromiers y of Lathery thoury pro higheria trick he has a p 40° At I I among requestionly decisions, that Laurer a attribute towards the Bire may characterized by flagtons contradictions" ("Dogmengesch.," 34, pp. 368, 878; up. pp. 771 f., [91 t] because her trains detectated the external authors y of the written Wilson (II lather a transmit of the Apone, per Ci After the time to the arrived deal and that of the I whether the time to be time to be the time to be the time to be the time to be time to be time to be th thus to Heat is described on the word or 1900, p. 30 , he used ad at very fearly about a the far at mound was that each one might happen. Concessing it what has beaut absorbed but with his I plant a light drawn and agree with the west and the last that there was continue thought not be ground in it has outs out but him to 4 to enterm it Around any remaining that is the President to the Appearance (now upon a secretary a hardest made that is may bee high of Joseph In restreated and the stee store the bank stee, the both, assembling to had be that it affect against the root prophetical audient first by the Hits takent at all moving that it did not steak of tarth of Chrystean doctrine but merely of history.

1 Köntler, fold., 21, p. 29,

FRUIT OF PRIVATE JUDGMENT 408

character and value to each man individually. At any rate, his attitude towards the Bible cannot be regarded as at all logical.4

Inward Asserance and Drongreements Without.

The second consequence of Luther's biblical subjectivism which we have to consider her outside him. It is the disconcerting divergence in interpretation which was the immediate result of his doctrine of "inward experience," to correct which he had recourse to some curious remedia-

First of all we may append some further quotations from his writings to those slresdy adduced. The significance of this remarkable side of the psychology of his doctrine is often not fully appreciated, because it seems scarcely believable that Luther should have ventured so far into the airy region of idealism. And yet, on the other hand, we have here the principal reason for describing the new doctrine as something interior, and as one doing better justice to our feelings and personality, which was Luther's own claum and, after him, that of Protestants generally. The difficulty, however, is that almost every sentence of Luther's regarding the part played by "inward assurance" in respect of the Bible, raises the question how that oneness of interpretation which he ever presupposes, is to escape shipwreck, even in the case of essential doctrines.

As early as Jan. 18, 1518, in his advice to Spaintin on the reading of Scripture, Listher had appealed to the mystic "influence," toling him to distruct himself and to rely solely on the " influence Spiritur"; this appeal he supports on his own inward experience. In this case his experience, however, mainly concerned the confirmation of his chief doctrine; for it was under an inspiration from on High that he had begun to feel his way to the new Evangel of Justification (see vol. m., p. 110 ft.). But what was to be done when others, too, laid claim to a similar experience and inspiration?

At a later date he described to his friends how he had learnt to understand Scripture " en maximus aponièus et inniationièus " ; it was thus he had found in the Bible the Divinity of Christ and the artisles on the Trinity; even now he was more partain of ³ F Loofs ("Dogmengreeh.,"⁴ p. 747) may that Luther reintre-duoed the Catholic ideas he had "varioushed," and made this "burden in Protestantian heavier than it had ever been before." Op. above, p. 398 f.

* Jun. 18, 1516, "Benefwecheel," 1, p. 142.

these truths by experience than by faith." Even the absolute predistination of the damined to hell, the entire charact of fruitful for doing what is good and other extravagant opinions questioned even by his cun followers, he declares he had beened directly from the Bible. In 1534 he places Ecopture aide by mie with inward experience (or the Spart), as the warrant-green in the ease of others-for all knowledge of things Divine Thus he aboves applies to the Agranton Creed 4. In 1837 he said in a sermon as Schwalksiden, " not only did all thus (what is professed in any a read) take place as we read in the Word of the Course, but the Boly Gibest also writes it inwardly in our heart. I He accepts the teaching of the Apostles Creed because he has convened himself that it is based on Holy Writ. * Dut how if others are not thus convinced? Were they too to be fastened to the degme ?

H. Hesberg gives a good account of Lather's views on the character of the dogmas of the ancient Church 1 ... 116 treats the symbols of the ascient Church with great respect, particularly the Appatent (freed which contains all the chief articles of faith ! But this does not mean that he believes in each creed or Council as mich." "In his work "You den Conclus" with missturly historical continuous (2) has decien all brinding authority even to the answer Courselist, even the Council of the Apostlas passed procletions which were afterwards rearinded, and as did the Nacena Council. "Dogma is true," as runs Lather's teaching at given by Seeberg, "unly so for as it agrees with Scripture , in itied it m of no authority. But the truth of Scripture is one that Matherina, "Aufmichrungen," p. 58.

I In this researchable passage of his pagameters of 1 Car. gr. (1634, " Works," Ect. of , 5), pp. 102-104), he achieve alt to " hold fast to the doctrino and preaching for which we have both ours fleripture and also inward experience. These should be the two unterests and the two teststores of true doctors " He have invergle against the fanators to ones they taught, " what not one of them had experienced," " on uncertain delunion of which not one of them had but any experience " ... " None of the faration are able to prove their contention either by bloor own experience or he that of others ". Of named, however he midd may: "I have experienced it; for I too was encore pross merit," etc.; then follows the legend of his life in the monastery and of how, before his therevery of the serior of the text on which his now touching restod, his had acres known what it was to have a " graceous God." whoever winder not to see, let him look to these two peints, whether he for all to be bear witness to lise distribute out of the option and a supermodel experience, as we can to our doctrine and preaching."

Faith," 1837 Before thus: "This is to have the Holy Chest, when we experience in our bearts the Creat at and Resemption." "The Papir mad his people do not feel this in their hearts."

* "All the articles wisich he is keved he had repeatedly drawn from Scripture." "Werke," Weum, ed., 26, p. 500, Erl. ed., 30, p. 563. Vom Abendens, Christi Bekentna," 1536

 "Lehrb, der DG.," part 3, Erlangen, 1886, p. 200 f
 Seeberg refers to "Werke," Erl. od., 28, pp. 413 f., 346 f.; 0', p. 29 ff ; 13 5 p. 221 ft ; 30 5 p. 297 ft to attented interserly. Hence we can any that the Holy Gheat produces in us the assurance of the true districts [of the Apostha' Creat, "—The page-heading where these words occur russ : "Luther's independence of dogma."

FRUIT OF PRIVATE JUDGMENT 405

A legily important statement on the interior instruction that gree on when we read herepture is contained in Listher's quite early work." The Coperation Robitenson " (1670). The mul, he mays there, referring to a manufactuod passage of fit. Augustically on a well-known fact in the natural order, is so affected by the truth, that, thanks to it, it is able to judge rightly and stroly of all things; it is forced to confess with unfasting certified that thus is the truth, just as reason affirms with unfailing certified that there and seven make ten, the same is the case with all real Christians and their cruitual arms which, according to 1 Cor is 14, prigns all things and is judged of no man half he works of the Sparit, bestowed for a while by God on some few Christians in the early days of the Church, and constitut apply to the ordinary conditions of inter-times.

Luther simply ignores the objection, that, if every man is judge, unatterable discord must ensue. The way in which he contrived so long to concent this from himself is psychologically remarkable. For instance is one of the principal passages where this objection should have been faced, will in his world against King Henry VIII, he glosses over the difficulty with the assertion that, even under the Popu, there was also no unity of ductries, he then consider himself with the words of Clinic (John to), that all true Christians "shall be taught of God." and that every one that both heard the Pather cometh to the Sevenur, the Spirit of God makes all to be one and effects the at the idealous that could expect such results in a world inhabited by human boings. In the end, however more this was scarcery to be looked for, "external unity would be sufficiently anceguarded by the one Baptions and one Supper, whereby all "testaly to the onescen of their faith and spirit. " At any rate, he is confident that the true explanation viz. his own) of the traths of saivation will gain the upper hand. For the Church eannot persah.

In point of fact Lather soully fancous homelf partified in appealing to this entirely new meaning put by him on the promise to the Church that she shad mover period; she is indestruct be because true believes wit always to there to maintain Lather a interpretation of revention and of the imputed righter usees of Christ, and because any general lating away from the truth is

Reference to "Werke " Rel od 23, pp 248, 267, 201 p 148.
 Weim, ed., 6, p. 561; "Opp. let, ver.," 5, p. 108. Kietlin, "Lethers Theol.," 11, p. 308.
 Ibut, 10, 7 p 210-6, p 444; "Her draws; 5: ampolarum est see ^{} Duck, 10, 2 p. 210-8, p. 444 s. Her drover s. So are palariest out the surfacewals at producing, quantized modifies at surfaces disconserved at term equations account than account and surfaces F^{\pm} at a

They gave run to questions in his own day, and to comething more than more questions. The bitter theological discounses already funted at were the result. The inevitable divergency in the teterpretation of the Bible was seen everywhere, and a handred different opinions, serse based on the inward assurance given by the 'Spirit of God, some on the reflections of remon, took the field. We know to what an extent Luther had to suffer from the discord born of his principle, not morely from such comparatively unimportant persons as Jacob Schools' and his "dargracefully arrogant" colleague, Johann Agricola, not merely from the fenales and Anabaptists who found as the Bible a different teaching on Baptiscs, divine worship and morabit, or from the Zwinghins with their divergent behind interpretation of the Eucharut, but even, so to speak, in his own family, from Melanchthon, who was rush enough to melane to the fivem reformed doctrinou and to fight sky of the stricter Latherspains. "The presumption," Lather declares, strangely enough, " in really us bearable, that propie should not up against the authority of the Church, ' despute the teaching of the best and ablest, and only worship their own views in Body Bringture. " The name of the Church should be held in high honour. * He forbore, however, to specify which thurch he meant, and moreover he had not himself above every Church ... " All other forms of arrogance," he declares, "ran be endured and allow of improvement, as in the healing art, in philosophy, in postry, in mechanics and in she case of the young . . . But that shorting terrograms shookages "on the magree of all evel, and a communicity fire." (

So little did he succeed in repressing "theological arrogance," but rather, by his action, threw open the doors to it, that in

¹ Hid., 18, p. 649 f. — 7, p. 171. ¹⁶ Do serve arbitris.¹⁶ Reatlin, Sted.,

12, p. 361.

Hence his confession "Credo codeman sanctom catholicam, at usquaar bele ast, illam creare eteam an minima arteculo," "Warbo," chid

2 Kantlan, illad,, 23, p. 20.

4 Above, vol. iii., p. 401 Vol. iii., p. 400.

Lauterback, "Tagebuch," p. 101.

FRUIT OF PRIVATE JUDGMENT 407

1525 he was forced to lament ! "There are as many sects and beliefs as there are heads. This follow will have nothing to do with baptism, another denies the Secrement, a third believes that there is another world between this and the Last Day. Some teach that Christ is not God, some say this, some that. . . . There is now no rustic so rade but that, if he dreams or fancies enything, it must be the whisper of the Holy Ghost and he himself a prophet. . . . There is no one who does not wish to be eleverer than Luther; they all want to try their steel on me. . . . They speak hits madmen | I have during the year to instento many such wretched to k. In no other way can the devil come to close to me, that I must admit. Formerly the world was full of nowy, discribeded stiffts giving themselves out to be the souls of men; now at as full of approachous spirits with bodies, who all declare that they are real angels." a

He has thus cramb of comfort : The world is the devil's playground; and aprears there must be.3

"This is all due," he easy finally, truly and aptly, " to their brouging their concest with them to the study of bringture, which has to submit to being judged, moulded and led by their head and reason," -- surely a bitter punishment for throwing over the divinely appointed authority of the Church, which decides on the sense of the Buble.

" By thus making individual experience the test," remarks a Protestant theologian, "the door seemed opened wide to neverending dimension. . . . Lather did not succeed in earrying his theory to its right conclusion. Indeed we even find him forms inting thoughts which wern to tend buck to the old, mechanical authority of Scripture.' According to this writer, Luther's conception of Scripture presented certain "Imperfections" which, " even in principle, were practically at variance with it; these, however, descripered in the fanatic movement taught Lather their disastrous effects. The same writer asks finally "But was it really a question merely of 'imperfections' which did not endanger the very essence of his views ? " !

"What did Luther set up, moved of tradition, as a principle of interpretation?" another Protestant theologian recently queried. He unswere: "In theory, that Scripture interpretathed; in practice however, on it doesn't, his own theology. **

Remedies against Disagreement. The Outward Word.

Since the harmony of the "Spirit," which Luther had so confidently looked for, failed to show itself in people's minds

Cp. abova, vol. iii., p. 399.

* "To the Christians at Astwerp " early in April, 1828. "Weeks," Erl. ed., 63, p. 242; " Briefwiched, " 6, p. 141.

1 thed , Erl. od., 63, p. 343

26rd., Weins, ed., 20, p. 573; Erl. ed., 43, p. 210
0. Scheel, sirit., pp. 38, 55. Cp. F. Loofs, above, p. 403, n. 1
W. Kahler, "Theol Lateraturating," 1902. No. 21 p. 578, seview of H. Prouss, "Die Emissiklung des Schriftprausign bes Lather."

and not a climmer of hope of any future agreement was visible, he found it necessary to insist far more strongly than heretofore on the outward Word; this was to check unwelcome inward revelations, to but everything in order and to be a bulwark against unusual views. "Now that the Apostles have preached the Word," so runs one of his most interesting pronouncements on this subject. 2 " and left us their writings, so that there is nothing more to reveal than what they have written, there is no need of any special new revelation, or miracles. This we know from the writings of the Apostles." It would be a different matter if all were filled with the Holy Ghost and His gifts: "were this so it would be an easy thing to preach and to govern and all would go on quite smoothly and well, as indeed it ought. But unfortunately this is not the ease, and those who have the Holy Chost and a right understanding are not so common," but "there are plenty who fancy they have mastered Scripture and have the Holy Ghost without measure." These want to be thought "far more deeply and profoundly initiated " than Luther himself, and " much more learned than we are." This he is not unwilling to allow, but on one thing he must insist, viz. on the "Word !" "This old and tried doctrine of the Apostles" he has "again brought to light," having found " all this darkened by the Pope and his human teaching"; "by the Grace of God we have brought it to light once more "; " it is the very same as the Apostlea first taught. But it has not been brought to light again without a revelation of the Holy Ghost, . . . He had to illurume our minds that Holy Scripture might be rightly viewed and understood"; hence "no other word or revelation is to be expected" "contrary to this doctrine. even were an angel from heaven visibly to bring" a new doctrine. Everyone can see "that God is tempting the people, particularly in these latter days of which it is said, that the devil shall rule mightily over Christendom by means of Antichrist."-Here, consequently, his teaching is put on a level with the "outward Word."

The outward Word, according to other passages where Luther is rather more reticent concerning the "revelation" he had received, was that plain and unassailable Bible teaching on which all "Spirits" must agree without any danger of divergency. This Word he now identifies with preaching. Preaching, however, is part of the office, and both office and preaching were controlled by Luther; indeed the office had been instituted chiefly by him and his sovereign. Hence, in effect, the outward Word is still Luther's word.

Above, passem

[&]quot; Werke," Erl. ed., 50, pp. 85-88.

IMPORTANCE OF "OUTWARD WORD" 409

"Faith," we read of the outward Word, seemingly contradicting the freedom Luther had formerly proclaimed. "comes of bearing, i.e. from preaching, or from the outward Word. This is the order established by God and He will not derogate from it. Hence contempt for the outward Word and for Scripture is rank blasphemy, which the secular authorities are bound to punish, according to the second Commandment which enjoins the punishment of blasphemy." This occurs in the booklet officially circulated in 1586 among the pastors of the Saxon Electorate.1 A Protestant researcher who has recently made a special study of the "Inquisitioa" in the Saxon Electorate has the following remark concerning this statement, which is by no means without a parallel in Luther's works: "Thus even contempt for Senpture here meaning contempt for Luther's interpretation of the Bible text-was already regarded as 'rank blasphemy ' which it was the duty of the authorities to punish. To such a pass had Evangelical freedom already come 111

In order to uphold his own reading of the Bible against others which differed from his, Luther incidentally appealed with the utmost vigour, as the above examples show, to the Church, to tradition and to the Fathers, whose authority he had nevertheless solemnly renounced

This was the case especially in the controversum on the Zwinghan doctrine of the Supper. In defending the Real Presence and the literal sense of the words of consecration, Luther was in the right. He could not result the temptation to adduce the convincing testimony of tradition, the voice of the "Church" from the sarkest ages, which spoke so loadly in defence of the truth. It was then that he wrote the oft-quoted words to Albert of Brandonburg, in order to retain him on his side and to preserve him from Swington contamination. "That Christ is priment in the Secrement is proved by the books and writings, both Greek and Latin, of the dear Fathers, also by the daily unips and our experience tall this very hour; which testimony of all the holy Christian Churches even had we as other, shruld million to make in remain by this article. "I It is true that elsewhere we find him anying of the tradition of the Fathers: "When the Word of God forms down to us through the Fathers it assume to use blee milk strained through a coal-aack, when the milk must needs be black and sasty." This meant, he says, "that the Word of God was in timelf pure and true, bright and clear, but by the teaching of the Fathers, by their books and their writings, it was much darkened and encoupled "I " And even if the Fathers agreed with you," be easy clearborn, "that as not enough. I want Holy Wint, because I too am fighting you in writing."

⁴ P Wappler, "Inquisition and Ketzerprocesses in Ewicked sur Reformationszeit," Leipzig, 1908, p. 69. The booklet was written by Melanchthon but was certainly sirculated with Lather's approval. ⁸ Wappler, 57d.

In his contriversy with Ewingli, Luther even came to plead the cause of the Catholic principle of authority. In his tract of 1027, "Das chees Wort Christi, "Das at mein Leib" noch fest stehen," he declared that Zwinglia interpretation of the Bible had already given rise to "many opinions, many factions and much decension." Such arbitrary exegoric neither can une may go any further. " And if the world is to lest much looger, we shad on account of such descrisions again be obliged, like the discioning to mak for busing contriveness and to set up now how and ordinances in order to preserve the people in the unity of the faith. This will succeed as it succeeded before. In fine, the devil is too clever and powerful for us. He hinders as and stops the way sverywhere. If we truth to study Scripture he reason up as much strife and disamoun that we tire of it He to, and to called, Satan, s.e. an adversary " He here attributes to the devil the defects of his own Scriptural system, and puts away as comething wrong even the very thought that it contained faults, mother trait to his psychological perture: "The devil is a consurer," " Union God assets us, our work and counsel is of no avail. We may think of it as we like, he still remains the Prince of this world. Whoever does not believe this, let him comply try and one. Of this I have experienced comething. But let no one becove me until he has himself experienced at." ! There is no doubt, that, in 1827, bether did have to go through come severe struggles of conscience.

The "wee held tast to " Serieture " and to their own " Spirit."

H. Bu linger, the leader of the Zwinglians, proved more logical than Luther in his interpretation of the new principle of Scripture. In his book on the difference between the Evangelical and ¹ Letter of Feb. or beginning of March, 1832, "Werke," Woim. ed., 30, 2, p. 552; Ecl. ed., 54, p. 266 ("Briefwechiel," 9, p. 187).

Werke," Weim, ed., 7, p. 622, Erl. ed., 27, p. 225.

Third., $2, p. 60 = 30, p. 16 f.

[&]quot;Werks," Erl. ed., 63, p. 50, Table-Talk, in connection with some words reported to have been attered by Andreas Proton, which, however, were certainly means by him in a different sense.

IMPORTANCE OF "OUTWARD WORD" 411

Roman doctrines (Zürich, 1551) he deliberately rejected quite a number of traditional, Catholic practices which Luther had spared; for instance, the use of religious pictures in the churches, coremonies, the liturgical chants, confession, etc. With this same weapon he attacked not only Catholicism, but also Luther's doctrine of the Real Presence in the Blessed Sacrament and the whole Church system as introduced by the Wittenbergers.

Luther, for his part, in order to retain the hible on his side, used a very arbitrary method of Scripture interpretation both against the Swiss theologisms and against Catholicism and its defenders. In many cases it was only his pseudiar exegens (to be considered below, xxviii., 2) that furnished him with the Scriptural arguments he needed.

Thus, in his attitude towards Scripture, the Wittenberg Professor wavers between tradition, to which he frequently appeals almost against his will, and that principle of independent study of the Bible under enlighteament from on high, which is ever obtruding itself on him. The latter principle he never denied, in spite of his sad experiences with the doctrine that everyone who is taught by the Holy Ghost can draw from Scripture his own belief, and, accordmg to St. Paul, with the help of this light, test the teaching and opinions of all.1 Yet-strange as it may seem on the part of an assailant of authority—the last word on matters of faith belongs, according to him, to authority. This is his opimon for practical reasons, because not everyone can be expected, and but few are able, to undertake the task of anding their belief for themselves in the Bible. Moreover, what one may possibly have learnt from Scripture at the eost of toil and with the help of inspiration, cannot so readily become the common property of all. On the other hand, according to Luther, the "externes sudiesum" which m supported by the " externs cleritas" of Sempture, as interpreted by himself and proclaimed with authority by the preachers, was intended for all.4

Koetlin, "Luthers Theol.," 14, p. 279,

Anglim 15. 15 De doctrina cognoscera et sudicare perionel ad annea et angulos Christianes et sia pertinal, ul anathema alt, qui has sus uno pilo lusceri. . . Nuna autem (Christia) non solum sus, sed preceptum, uidecardi statuit, ul has sola ancieritas satu esse quest adversus omnium pontatioum, amnium pateum, amnium pateum, amnium conciliorum, amnium scholarum sentantus. . . Huno subscribunt ferms amnes amnium prophetarum syllabar . . . Habet hie Henricus noster aut ultus impurus Thomista, qued setes obgannius? Norme obstruarumus as laquantum insqua?

412 LUTHER THE REFORMER

The Way of Settling Doubts Concerning Fatth. Assurance of Salvation and Belief in Dogma.

When we come to examine Lather's teaching on the nature of the faith which is based on the Bible and to enquire how doubts regarding this Bible teaching were to be quarted, we are again faced by the utmost waywardness.

In his "You header Gentallt des Sacramentes" (1822), Luther says of bolief as the tenths of revolution generally: "And it is not enough for you to any. Luther, Peter or Paul his said it, but you must feel Christ Himself in your own corncience and in amused beyond all doubt that it is really the Word of God, even though all the world should be against it. He long in you have not this feeling it is certain that you have not tasted the Word of God, but are still barging by your ears on the lips or the pen of man and not clanging with all your heart to the Word" three Christ is the one and only tencher it is plan. "white burned marrierous of souls them are [vis. the Paperts] who preach to souls the doctrines of man."

The whole passage is of the utmost practical importance, because in a Luther swise to solve the question against asked by so many. Whe will assure us that all that we are now told that we must believe if we are not much to lose our mule, a really the teaching of Christ? To this he here gives an answer which is intended to estudy even one in charger of death and to instruct him fully on the matter of his solvation.

The olden Church had given her faithful a clear arower which set every doubt at rest: The warrant for our belief in the authority of the Church metitated by Christ and endowed by Ged with infallshifty. In effect the voice of the General Councils, the desires of an assesses from it is earl of Christ on the Papal throne, the teaching of the birearchy everywhere and at every time, the conceners of the faithful, in boref, the outward tests mony of Christ's whose Church, aroused in all hearts the bangy cortainty that the faith offered was indeed the reseletion of toid , people, indeed, brueved in food and in the Word, but what they believed was what the Church proposed for bestel. The Crurch also declared, though not in the same sense as Lather, "Pulse non adirents auctoritate and Syrritu and Fire entur on cords "9 The Church tought, what the Council of Treet emphassed anow, vis. that, by the action of the Holy Chort alone, i.e. by the supernatural Genes of God which exists the powers of man, forth attains to what is requisite for snivation.

Lather, who overfrom the authors y of the Church's teaching affirm, was unable to provide the soul at its struggle after faith with any guarantee beyond his own authority to take the Church's place. In his "You besider Gretalit des Bacramentee" he refers to Chron Hamself the man opposited by doubt and fear, vis. to a court of moreoid managementals to the source, and thus he did at a time whom he himself had eterted all kinds of discussions on the series of the Gospel, and when Christ was being claimed in support of the most widely divergent views. He refers the enquirer to Christ, because here he deems it better not to say plainly " hold fast to me." though elsewhere such an admonstion was not too bold a one for him to give. "Think rather for yourself," such is his advice, " you have death or paraceution in front of you, and I counct be with you then nor you with me. Each one must fight for himself and evercome the devil, death and the world. Were you at such a time to be looking round to see where I was, or I to see where you were, or were you dusturbed because I or anyone else on earth asserted differently, you would be lost already and have let the Word slip from your heart, for you would be canging, not to the Word, but to me or to some other; in that case there is no help." !

 [&]quot;Werke," Werm, ed., 10, 3, p. 23; Erl, ed., 28, p. 299.
 Isod., Werm, ed., 2, p. 429 f.; "Opp. lat. var.," 3, p. 287.

EXPERIENCE VERSUS AUTHORITY 418

He thus leaves the anxious man " to himself " at the most awful of moments; elsewhere, too, he does the same. When he invites every man to "taste the Word of God" betimes and to "feel" how directly " the Master speaks within his heart," this is merely a roundabout way of repeating the comfortless warning that "each one must fight for himself." In other words, what he means is: I have no sure warrant to give in the stead of the Church's authority; you must find out for yourself whether you have received the true Word of Christ by consulting your own feelings.

In addition to this, in the opinion of many Protestant theologians, the faith to be derived from the Bible which everyone must necessarily arrive at was very much circumscribed by Luther. "Man's attitude towards Christ and His saving Grace "loomed so large with him, that it "decided the question whether a man was, or was not, a believer." If, in the Protestantism of to-day, Luther's "idea of faith " is frequently taken rather narrowly, it must be admitted that in many of his statements and demands he himself goes even further. We have here to do with that "two-sidedness in his attitude towards Scripture," which "is apparent at every period of his hfe." If we keep to the earlier and more "liberal" side of his "Evangelical conception of faith," then indeed the trusting and confident assumption of such a relationship with Christ would certainly be "decisive in the question whether a man was a believer or not, and Luther hamself frequently used this criterion, for instance, when he answers as follows the question: Who is a member of the Church and whom must one regard as a dear brother in Christ: "All who confess Christ as sent by God the Father in order to reconcile us by His death and to obtain grace for us"; or again elsewhere: "All those who cling to Christ alone and confess Him in faith," or, yet again: All those "who seek the Lord with all their heart and soul, and trust only in God's mercy." In such utterances we have the purely religious conception of Evangelical faith clearly summarised." (Cp. above, vol. iii., p. 18.)

^{2 &}quot;Werke," Weim. ed., 10, 2, p. 22; Erl. ed., 22, pp. 208, 200. Cp. above, p. 397, z. 1, also pp. 398 and 400, on the "sudirsum taternus"

I The last words are from Echeel. See above, p. 202, n. 1, p. 74.

414 LUTHER THE REFORMER

Agreeably with this conception of faith, some Protestants have contended that Luther should have been much more broad-minded with regard to doubts and to doctrines which differed from his own; his opposition to other views, notably to those of the Zwinglians, brought him, bowever, to another conception of faith, to one more closely related to the Catholic theory. According to Catholic doctrine, faith is a firm assent to all that God has revealed and the Church proposes for belief. It is made up of many articles, not one of which can be set aside without injury to the whole. Luther, so we are told, "owing to his conception of faith for this one [the Catholic one], according to which faith is the acceptance of a whole series of articles of faith."

In reality he did not merely "run the risk" of reaching such a doctrine; he had, all along, even in earlier days, been moving on these same lines, albeit in contradiction with himself. It was in fact nothing altogether new when he wrote in the Articles of Schwabsch: "Such a Church is nothing else than the faithful in Christ, who believe, hold and teach the above Articles." The faith for which he wishes to stand always comprised the contents of the oldest Creeds, and he prefers to close his eyes to the fact that they were really undermined by his other propositions. By these articles he is determined to abide. Hence it is hardly fair to appeal to him in favour of their abrogation, and any such appeal would only serve to emphasise his self-contradiction. Luther himself, when dealing with opponents, frequently speaks of the breaking of a single link as being sufficient to make the whole chain fall apart. "All or nothing" was his cry, viz. the very same as Catholics had used against his own innovations. In short, in his "two-sidedness." he. quite generally, seeks a sure foothold against difficulties from within and from without in the principle of authority in its widest meaning, and, when trying to safeguard the Apostles' Creed and the "occumenical symbols," he appeals expressly to the Catholic past. He says that by thus vindicating the Apostles' Creed and that of Nicsea he wished to show that he " was true to the rightful, Christian Church, which had retained them till that day."1 The Fathers preserved them and, as in the case of the Athanasian Creed, supplemented and enlarged the traditional formulas, the better to counter hereties; Luther is even willing to accept new terms not found in Scripture, but coined by the Church, such as "peccatum originale" or "consubstantialis" (outpowers), since they might profitably be employed against false teachers.

¹ Cp. "Weeks," Weim ed., 28, p. 590 ff.; Erl. ed., 35, p. 234 ff.; 52, 702

^{} Article 12. "Werler," Weim, ed., 30, 3, p. 181; Erl. ed., 24, p. 343. (3 Kaweren airlin, when quoting this passage (Möller's "Lebrb der KG.," 3*, p. 184), "It is here, therefore, that the 'Communion of Baints' begins to become Luther's confessional Church." The Articles of Schwabach, which were sent by Luther to the Elector after the Confession of Marburg (above, vol. iii., p. 381), probably on Oct. 7, 1529, were mainly intended to oppose the Zwingham. It is when repudiating them, as non-Christians, that Luther puts forward the above conception of the Church.

Protestant Objections to Luther's so-called " Formal Principle."

"It is not for us to tone down or conceal the contradictions which present themselves," writes a Protestant theologian who has made Luther's attitude towards Sempture the subject of particular study. "... Even judged by the standard of his own day Luther does not display that uniformity which we are entitled to expect.... The psychological motives in particular are very involved and spring from different sources. The very fact that throughout his life he exhibited a certain obstinacy and violence towards both himself and others, must render doubtful any attempt to trace everything back to a single source.

¹ "Werke," Erl. ed., 23, p. 252 ff., in the preface to his edition of these Creeds, and the "Te Deum," 1538.
² "Werke," Werm, ed., 8, p. 117; "Opp. lat. yaz.," 5, p. 505.

416 LUTHER THE REFORMER

Obstinacy always points to contradictions." This author goes so far as to say: "We might almost give vent to the paradox, that only in these contradictions is uniformity apparent, such a proposition would, however, hold good only before the court of psychology." "To-day it is not possible to embrace Luther's view in its entirety."

In an historical account of Luther's teaching (and it is in this that most Protestant scholars are interested) we must, as we advance, ever keep in view Luther's whole individuality with all its warring elements. The difficulty thus presented to our becoming better acquainted with his views is, however, apparent from the words already quoted from one of Luther's biographers concerning Luther's wealth of ideas, which also, to some extent, apply even to his statements on dogma: "Every word Luther utters plays in a hundred lights and every eye meets with a different radiance which it would gladly fix."

In spite of the difficulties arising from this character of the Wittenberg Doctor, early orthodox Lutheranism taught that he had act up the "sols scripture" as the "formal principle" of the new doctrine. According to emment authorities in modern Protestantism, however, this formal principle was stillborn; it was never capable in practice of supporting an edifice of doctrine, still less of forming a community of believers. Hence the tendency has been to make it subscriptent to the "Evangelical" understanding of the Bible.

Thus F. Kropotecheck, the author of the learned work "Das Behnftprinzip der lutherischen Kirche" (1994), says candidly, "that the formal principle of Protestantiam [Scripture only] does not suffice in itself as a foundation for the true Christian life whether of the individual or of a community" "Where the Evangelical content is lacking, the formal principle does not resabove sterile criticism."

Kropatecheck's examination of the mediaval views on Scripture led has moreover to recognise, that, in theory at least, the Bible always occupied its due place of honour, its content was, however, so he fancies, not understood until Luther rediscovered it as the Gospel of the "forgiveness of aims through Christ." So far, according to him, did esteem for Scripture as the Word of God go in the Middle Ages, that he even ventures to characterise the formula "sold scripture" as "Catholic commonplace";

Scheel, wid., p. 75.
 Above, vol. is., p. 21.
 Vol. i., p. 58.
 P. 459.
 P 440.

this, however, he can only have intended in this summ in which it was read and supplemented by musticer Protestant troubigues.

In practice this del not each dir the interpretation of ferry care on the lines of tradition." The so-ended fermal practical," the above work gives in to any, with quite remarkatio farmed to the past, "was much more utilised in the Micke Ages than popular necessite would lead us to suppose. To the Referention we saw section the formula ("sele acceptors") nor the immunity on the hieral cases, out the theory of inspiration, nor accordy at ything class demanded on the a correl pair scriptural teaching!" "Almost all" the qualities attributed to Holy floripture in the early, orthodox days of Protestantians " are already to be mut with in the Middle Ages."

In the same work Kropstecheck rightly some up the teaching

 W. Kabhar in his service of Exeputations; ["Thesi Literategrateg," 1806, ed. 452 ft.).

* P. 450. For proofs that, in the Moldle Ages, the Bible encapsed its due position in the facts and life of Christians. op. E. Houley, " Die Immeration der hij Behrift in den Amerikaanseen des MA.," 1984.

Important der hi. Sohrift in den Amerikaansgen des MA ;" 1006.

Entract en andred am tus detailed proofe g van in Krepatschook's work of how the heretical Waldsman, and, after those, Wichf and Han, gend the rade accepture." against tradition and the authority of the Chipsh. The energies of the Wasterson had already shown that it then quite appearable to use the precipie without accepting at the name time cortain of the decirons of the Church is 17 ff). With H as " the formula and complians many again and many in his workings as a haddle-ory " (p. 76). He would the " list Christs " and no " layer town," Donne, no Isseretain, indiagreeses, Cramase Bulls, principoid or westmany. The revenues many force of the forms a to not reachin in High and still more in the later Hountee. they declared the "Law of Orace" to be sufficient even for east life, and, as a newspool of Semplane," prestanced war on those lards who thought differently, the Princes and the monactores. World, "a liable theological from head to feet," The even finds in Complute al. the majors and learning of the model, and describes it as a book everyone one understand, registered a success which was "great" only in the revolutionary sense. The Ribin standpoint of Oceans, to which Kropatacheck age devotes attention, has espectling in common with that of Latter (op Eropatperson. "Occasion and Luther" in "Bestrian our Fredering should. Thesi " 1900, p. 40 ff j. Krepstechnes emphasism the fact, that Owner, in his representative to the Press had eccented to "the whole the right of interpretation, and him Maraless of Paden. winhed to not made gran-made laws for the Buile and the law of mature. The last say of the Mouter Ages and the "appeals part and neal norsal. Items is nonrected with H we herep use show how dangerests and sub-reserve any arbitrary treatment of the Pités rouril be. The westing Wiles of Cod houseous a marging whomas has receive be partition against the highest powers are excuse for grown inclementarism and hhertisism, and a versiable made to be suplisted by staged, every fanation,-Cp., on Kropatecheck, M. Buchberger, in "Theol Revus $505 p $10.0 ; his review constitutes as to owner. " that his artist foundation too be won, but that exercting tellors welcook an authoritative, each is the first material, is fall to exponent of Hely Superture. The call for such an expenses to the final entertuon powerfully berne in an the mind."

14.--2 E

on the inspernition of the canonical hosins, of St. Thomas Aguines, the principal exponent of the med avail builded teaching, desag no in a couple of nenteness the elegeness and conclusiveness of which contrast strangely with the new doctrine: " The effect of impiration," according to this Dector of the Church, implies, negatively, preservation from error, positively, an enlightenment, both for the perception of supernatural truth and for the right judging of natural vertice. Reyord this, a certain impulse from on high was needed to move the secred action to write the builden of their meanings.

That in the past the doctrine of interpretation was bound upwith the doctrine of inspiration, is according to the statements of another Protestant writer, P. Drews, cathresied as follows by the Catholic voice of Wittigald Parkhetmer: "We should have to lock on ourselves as reprobate were we to demose even one syllable of Holy Scripture, for we know and firmly believe that our selvation rests solely and entirely on the Gospel. House we have it daily an our heads and read it and regard it as the guide of our lives. But no one can blame us if we place greater relation on the interpretation of the holy, arcient Fathers than on some garbled account of Holy Scripture, since it is, also daily evident that there are as many different readings of the Word of God as there are men. Herein her the acures of all the exile and disorders, vis. that every fool would expound Scripture, predices to eay, to his own advantage."*

Pretestant theologians have recently been diligent in studying Lather's teaching on the Bible. The conclusions arrived at by O. Scient, who severely criticises Lather, have several times been quoted in this work. Is. If imme, in a scholarly work entitled Luthers Stellung zur Hollgen Schrift," has pointed out that Lather, who " afterns the existence of real macranacies in Hely Scripture," nevertheless, in the very year that he expressed contempt for certain books of the New Testerront, loudly demanded "the tripest belief ("firmulative tradetur. nothing erroneous is contained in the essential books."*

A. Ushey, a theologian to whom it foll to review the book, declared, that, unfortunately, in quie of this and other easilys on the sub-ort, he sure and decisive midriant on Lather a attitude tesearcie Holy Scripture had yet been arrived at 4- Done this not, per inco, and unt to making that any ultimate wordet of hermony, truth and alsones of contradictions is out of the question f

R. Seeberg in one work criphas see "Lather's independent and entired attatude towards the lands of the Old and New ^{*} W. Pirkheimers Stellung zur Reformat on," 1887, p. 117. * From Pickle no run" Orat o applies. For the Convert of St. Clare et Nuremberg, in "Opp..." ed. M. Goldast, 1910, p. 375 seg.

Guters oh, 1903, p. 84 ff
 Werke, Werm, ed., 10, 2, p. 195; "Opp. lat. var.," 5, p. 406. "Theol. Literaturblatt," 1965, col. 41.

Tustament Canon." "Scripture is to be beloved not on the external authority of the Crurch but because it is revolution tented by experience. . . Feripture was to him the standard, test and measure of all ecclesiastical doctrine, but this is was as the expression of the experienced revolution of God." 2

This statement Seeberg further explains absorbers . "Though, in his controversion, Lather puts Scripture as the "Dryme law" against ad more codomestical law [vis. the Church's dogma], yet he regarded it as authoritative simply in so far as it was the original, vigorous witems to Christ and His salvation. Conactored in this light, Simpulse, however cannot be put aide by acts with matifying faith as the second principle of Protestanttern. The assential and fundamental thought is farth." - What Numberg hore says in α notly armed at the later orthodox. Listheran theni-grace who took from Luther the no-called formal principle of Protestantism, viz. the doctrine of the verbal inspiration of the Bible. "How is it possible, in view of Luther's reprobation of certain things in the Bible . . and his adminion that it contained mistakes, to imagine any verbal imperation ? ***

bushers has also a remarkable account of Lather's views on the relative to Scripture of that faith which in real ty is based on inward experience: "The specific content of Scripture" is "Christ, His office and hingshire." To this content it is that faith bears witness by shward experience (see above, p. 404 L). For faith is " the recognition by the heart of the Almighty love revenied to us in God. . . . This recognition involves also the cortainty that I am in the Green of God. . . * The truth of Scripturn is something demonstrated inwardly," etc. "The external, legal founding of doctrine upon degree at thus not ende, and an and as made of the ancient canon of Vincent of Lorens. Even the logal (dogmatic) application of Schipture is in procepts done eway with." Of the extent to which Luther carried out these principles the author cays in conclusion t. " That his greaters was not always exemplary and devoid of contradiction can introly be hinted at here.

It would have been better to say straight away that no non-contradictory use of contradictory principles was number.

Desiring with a work by K. Eger (" Lathers Auslegung des Alten Testamentes'), W. Kohier and "Any interpretation not finited by practical considerations"... was quite mannous to Luther, hence we must not make such a thing to him. . . . Our heat plan is to break with Lasther's privately of interpretation." And, before this . * Lather a principle of interpretation is everywhere the ' fides' and what Luther has to offer in the way of notor, "historical "interpretation is no growth of his own garden but a fruit of Humanism. . . Just as the Schockman found their theology in the Old Testament, as he did his. 4

Pp. $68, 263, 210 f.

 [&]quot; Grandrins der DG.," etc.*, Leipnig, 1910, p. 130.
 " Lehrbuch der DG.," find part, Ed., 1598, p. 233

^{* &}quot;Theol. Literaturzing , " 1991, eol. 272. O. Ritschl (" DO.," 1, 1966, p. 66 ff.) judges more favourably Luther's method of interpretation, however, presents much that calls for slover examination.

2. Luther as a Bible-Expositor

"Luther in his quality of Bible-expositor is one of the most extraordinary and puzzling figures in the domain of religious psychology."

Some Characteristics of Luther's Exegesis.

It is true that some of Luther's principles of exegesis are excellent, and that he has a better perception than many of his predecessors of the need of first ascertaining the literal sense, and, for this purpose, of studying languages. He is aware that the fourfold sense of Holy Scripture, so often wrongly appealed to, must retire before the literal meaning, and that we must ever seek what the sacred writer really and obviously meant, in whatever dress we find his ideas clothed. Some quite excellent observations occur in his works on the danger of having recourse to allegorical interpretations and of not taking the text literally.

Luther himself, it is true, in his earlier postils, frequently makes use of the allegory so dear to mediseval writers, often investing what he says in poetic and fantastic forms. Later on, however, he grew more cautious. Here again the abuse of allegory by the fanatics had its effect. In addition to this his constant efforts to prove his doctrine against theological gains against within and without his camp, forced him in his arguments to use the literal sense of the Bible, or at least what he considered such. The advantages of his German translation of the Bible will be spoken of elsewhere (see vol. v., xxxiv., 8).

Yet he lacked one thing essentially required of an expositor, vis. theological impartiality, nor was he fair to those means by which the Church's interpreters were guided in determining the sense of Scripture.

Concerning the latter, it is enough to remember how hightheartedly he threw overboard the interpretation of the whole of the Christian past. His wantonness, which led him to esteem as of no account all the expositions and teachings of previous ages, deprived his exegesis of much help and also of any stable foundation. Even considered from the merely natural standpoint, real progress in rengious knowledge must surely be made quietly and without any sudden break with what has already been won by the best minds by direct of diligent labour.

¹ Döllinger, ² Die Reformation, ¹¹ 3, p. 156.

CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS EXEGESIS 421

The rock on which Luther suffered shipweek was however above all his complete lack of impartiality. In his work as expositor his concern was not to do homage to the truth in whatever shape he might encounter it in the texts he was interpreting, but to introduce into the texts his own ideas. Bearing in mind his controversy and his natural temperament, this cannot, however, surprise us. Hence it is not necessary to take too tragically the tricks he occasionally plays with Bible texts. Some of these have been most painstakingly examined, and, indeed, it was not without its advantages to have the general complaints raised thus verified in individual instances. Thanks to his investigations Döllinger was able to write: "False interpretations of the most obvious and arbitrary kind are quite the usual thing in his polemics. It would hardly be possible to earry this further than he did in his writings against Emimus in the instances quoted even by Planck Indeed, examples of utter wilfulness and viclence to the text can be adduced in great number from his writings." Most frequently, as Dollinger points out, "his interpretation is false, because he foists his own peculiar ideas on the biblical passages, ideas which on his own admission he reached not by a calm and dispassionate study of the Bible, but under conditions of painful mental disturbance and anxiety of conscience." To this he was arged by the unrest certain Bible-sayings excited in him; in such cases, as Dollinger remarks, he knew how " to pacify his exceptical conscience by telling himself, that all this disquest was merely a temptation of the devil, who wanted to puzzle him with passages from Scripture and thus drive him to despair."*

The whole of his excgesis is pervaded by his doctrine of Justification. In this sense he says in the preface to Galatians, the largest of his exegetico-dogmatic works: "Within me this one article of faith in Christ reigns Döllinger, &od., pp. 156-173. Dende, "Luther and Luthertum," pp. 30 f., 668 fl., 675, 688, 716, and poseim.

 "Lather, eine Skuze," p. 59; "KL.," 82, p. 344.

supreme. Day and night all my ideas on theology spring from it and return thereto."1

"The privile of Janislastica," he declares, in a deputation in 1437, " is the master and prince, the lerd, regent and judge of every form of doctrase which preserves and rules all erclementical knowledge and exalts our conscioumen before God."*

Two years before this (1323) he expressed kimself still more strongly in a disputation : "Benjours is not to be understood against but for, Christ. Hence it must miler be made to apply to Hum or not be regarded as true Eccepture at al. 14 his highly vacanted idea of Justification he sought to apply first and forement to these business passages of the Bible which, to be expressed it, " preach Christ. Though giving the first place in the canonical regard to those writings where Christ is most strongly and fully reverted and but meant favour (when he does not reject them entirely) to those where this is not the case, he get contrieve to introduce his ever particular Christ into trinny parts of Scripture which really my nothing about Him. Everything that redeunds to the honour of Christ, so to the wanted and of the work of grace in man, as Lather understood it, must be forced into for page while everything that tends to mount mun a powers and the need of his co-operation must be expurged, since Christ cannot agrice at His right which He has from the Father except though the atter helplessness of man. The Bible must posture grow of any inner rightenumes on men's part that is of any value in God's night, it must never place on the lips of Christ any demand, any praise or reward for human effort. All sacred settempers which continues this are, so he says, in spite of his preference for the literal sense, not to be taken literally. Thus, when the Bilde says man shall, it does not follow that he can . Led rather wases thereby to conviors man of his help brunche, may, what is said in this connection of must und his works really applies to Christ, Who has done everything for us and makes it all own by faith.

"There were tense in his life when the antithesis between faith and works so dominated him and filled his mirel, that the whole Bible seemed to him to have been written simply to illustrate and emphasise this doctrine of Justification. *

Two portions of Holy Scripture, vis. the Epstles to the Romana and to the Galetians, according to hira, held the first place in their subgy of Climit, by their recommendation of [&]quot;Corner, in Gal.," I, p. 3, Itmischer.

 "Luputationen," ed. Drews. p. 119 : " Acts of a custofication in ad. morphists of principal domining sector of cooleg action annual penergy doctric naram, qui conservat et gubernat omnem distrinam ecclematicam et grigid consecutions mostrum cortin Dec."

^{* &}quot;Disputationes," p. 11, n. 61 * Düslinger, "Die Reformation," 3, p. 153.

* 156.

CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS EXEGESIS 428

faith in Him alone. Hence "all questions and all the more obscure passages of Scripture are to be solved and explained by these two epistles "1 If, in the Bible, good works are extelled or almsgiving praised, the word "fide" must always be understood, mince the meaning cannot but be that such works are profitable by faith.

In the case of the Evangelists, Matthew and Luke in particular, we must expound their writings in accordance with the doctrine of Justification through Christ and man's own helpleseness. "Sompture must be interpreted according to this article. . . . When Matthew and Luke speak of good works, they are to be understood and judged according to this rule.1

Thus, in all questions of exegesis the "preaching of Christ" is conclusive. We must, first of all, see whether each book commonly reckoned to form part of the Bible really "preaches Christ," and, where this is so, the same thoughts will control everything else.4

In the question of the relation of faith to the interpretation of Scripture, Luther hobbles strangely. On the one hand the Bible is to be interpreted strictly according to faith, on the other, faith is to be won solely from the Bible. The former proposition he thus explains in a sermon: It is a command that the interpretation of Sempture must "rhyme with faith and not teach anything contrary to or differing from what faith teaches." True faith, however, is that which is directed against the power of works, so that any interpretation of the Bible which contradicts this is wrong. Whatever teaches us " to have a good conscience towards God, except by faith alone and without any works, neither resembles nor rhymes with faith." Of the content of faith we are assured above all by inward experience and the Spirit. It is indeed on the "feeling and sentiment" that, in the case of faith, i.e. the acceptance of the Gospel Ibid., p. 434. Written in a Bible: "Ad omnia dicta scriptura, quibus videtur sustita operum status, respondeius ex Libre. 11, kao voce :

L "Briefe." 0, p. 424, undated, and to a person unnamed. " Ex his. duabus epistolis annes, qua inculent, questiones, vel aliagus scriptura loca obscuriora interpretator," Fide," etc.

* "Werke," Weim, ed., 33. p. 165 [; Eri. ed., 47, p. 37]. In the Exposition of John v...-viii. (1530-1632).

* Cp. 161d., Erl. ed., 63, p. 157.

* Ibid., 81, p. 23. Cp. p. 24: "But know that Pope, Councils and the whole world in all their teaching are subject to the meanest Christian whole world in all their teaching are subject to the meanest Christian and that they must tion, even to a child of seven who has the faith, and that they must accept his opinion."

message of salvation. Luther lays the chief stress.1 " If you feel it not, you have not the faith, the Word merely rings in your ears and hovers on your lips like foam on water."1

Luther is just as determined in proving faith from Scripture as he is in making Scripture subservient to and dependent on faith. "Without Sempture faith soon goes," he exclaims after labouring to bring forward arguments from the Bible in support of the new faith in Christ.* "Whatever is advanced without being attested by Scripture or a revelation need not be believed." * To this wine no water must be added";* to this sun no lantern must be held up ! " You must take your stand on a plain, clear and strong word of Sempture, which will then be your support."?

The worst of it is, as O. Schoel aptly remarks, that Luther pits his Christ against Scripture and thus makes the latter

On the one hand, according to Adolf Harnack, Luther, when making faith the rule of Bible interpretation, becomes "mediæval exegete" and borrows from the past even his types and allegories. Yet be cuts himself admit in the most decided fashion from the mediæval exegests, " not merely when it is a question of Justification," but even "in ^{1 &}quot;Werke," Weim, ed., 8, p. 357; Erl. ed., 149, p. 47; ep. p. 3°9 = 78.

^{} Ind., 13, p. 231; cp. Wenn. ed., 10, 3, p. 23, Ed. ed., 28, p. 298.

^{* &}quot;Werke," Ecl. ed., 15*, p. 145 f.

^{4 &}quot;Quod aine sempliera asservirer aut revelatione probata, opinari hort, credi non est accesse" "Werke," Weim, ed. 6, p. 508; "Opp. lat var.," 5, p. 30. Up., ibid., 2, pp. 297, 279, 309-15 = 1, pp. 89, 62, lui- i ö.

^{*} Ibid., 8, p. 141 f ; Erl ed., 27, p. 323 f. ; ep. p. 143 f.=325 f.

^{*} Inid., p. 235=39, p. 132. * Inid., 10, 3, p. 22 f.=28, p. 223. Cp. R. Seeberg, " Lehrb. der DG.," p. 285 f.

School gives Lighter's views on p. 45 as follows: "What is not tought by Christ is not apostolic even should Peter and Paul teach it. But ad that preaches Christ is apostone even should Judas, Annas, Pilate or Herod teach it. (' Werke, ' Erl ed., 63, p. 157.) . . . Hence Luther replies to his opponent, ' You appeal to the slave, i.e. to Scripture, and not even to the whole or the most excellent part of it. This slave I leave for you; as for me, I appeal to the Lord, Who is King of Scripture." ("Comm. in Gal," I, p. 387, Irmischer.) Scheel quotes the "Comm. in Gen.," I, p. 539: "Si adversaria scripturam teneral contra Christian, urgemus Christian contra scripturas." He says finally, p. 74. " Luther found himself in Scripture past as the simple man finds in the outward world the answer to his ewn world of sense; with the uncrining instinct of genius he found the essence of Scripture which was at the same time the essence of his own being."

CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS EXEGESIS 425

regard to such Scripture passages as contain nothing whatever about the doctrine of Justification and faith, or only alien matter."1

For instance, he finds righteousness by works condemned and faith exalted in the very first pages of the Bible; for Cain, his brother's murderer, "clung to works and lost the faith," that was his misfortune; whereas Abel held aloof " from free-will and the ment of works" and "kept the faith m a pure conscience." "The same thing happened later with Isaac and Ismael, Jacob and Esau, and others." -Yet, in spite of such condemnation of works, many passages, particularly in the New Testament, seem to tell in favour of works. This, however, is only due to the fact that at the time of the New Testament writers it was desirable to mise up a bulwark against any too great esteem for faith. Thus it was really not meant quite seriously: in the same way even he himself, so he says, had been obliged to oppose this excessive esteem for faith, because, in his day, and owing to his preaching, the people "wanted merely to believe, to the neglect of the power and fruit of faith " (in good actions).*

Owing to his habit of ever reading the Bible through the glass of his doctrine of Justification, his handling of Rom. x1. 32 (in the Vulgate: " Conclusit Deus omnia in incredulitate ut omnium miserectur", was such that Döllinger found in it no less than "three falsifications of the words of Paul."

Luther's marginal glosses to his translation of the Rible are open to plentiful objections, for their purpose is to recall the reader as often as possible to the basic theories of his doctrine.4

Some Protestants have been exceedingly frank in characterising the strained relations often noticeable between Luther's exeges and true scholarship.

Friedrich Paulsen, in his "Geschichte des gelehrten Unterrichts," when dealing with the demand made by the "exegosis of the Reformation," viz. that the reader must cling to the plant text and letter of Scripture, says. "Luther by no means Lehrb d, DG_a¹¹ 3⁴, p. 867.

 Döllinger, Die Reformation, 3, p. 158.

^{*} Itel., p. 160. For the liberty which Luther permitted himself in his translation of the sacred text, see vol. v., xxxiv., 3.

Cp. Döttinger, ibid., pp. 151-156.

considered himself bound to the letter and the grammatical sense of the text of Scripture. Where the letter was in his favour, he indeed used it against others, the Swiss, for instance, but, where it was not, he nevertheress stands by his guns and knows what Scripture ought to have said. Everybody knows with what scent regard he handled certain books of Scripture, estimating their value according as they agreed more or less with his teaching, and even amending them a little when they fulled to reach his standard or to present the pure doctrine of justification by faith "slone" in a light sufficiently strong. . . . In order to understand Scripture it is necessary [according to Luther] to know beforehand what it teaches, Scripture is indeed the rule of doctrine, but, they recent, doctrine is also the rule of Scripture which must be interpreted "ex-analogic fidei.""

Referring to Lather's interpretation of the Epistle to the Romana, Adolf Hausrath pithily observes: "Lather read this Epistle to the Romana into everything and found it everywhere." Though Hausrath makes baste to add that this was because "his personal experiences agreed with those of the Epistle to the Romana," still, his reference to the psychological basis of the phenomenon is quite in piace. "He had been ied to draw from Scripture one basic principle which to him was the embodiment of truth, viz. Justification by Frith. That only which can counter to this 'faith alone' was to be set ande."1

Luther's Exegesis in the Light of His Early Development.

With the help of the newly published Commentary on Romans, written by Luther in his youth (vol. 1., p. 184 ff.), we can trace the beginnings of his curious exegesis more easily than was possible before.

What we want first of all is a key to that more than human confidence which prompts the new teacher to blend in one his own interpretation and the actual text of the Bible and to say, "My word is the truth." This key is to be found in his early history. It was then, in those youthful days when he began morbidly to broad over the mysteries of the Epistle to the Romans, all unable to grasp the profound thoughts it contained, that the phenomenon in question made its first appearance.

We must call to mind that the young and ardest University professor, though deficient in himselfly and in the especity to assuming the sublime teachings of the Epsele to the Romans, at ad all the more under the spell of two museuding ideas which had long dominated him, viz. on the one hand, the supposed Gesch ," etc., 13, 1896, p. 199.

 Luthers Leben," Z, p. 190 f.

dopth and teansforming power of the knowledge of Scripture he had already acquired and, on the other, the need of assailing the self-rightness and hypeoritical Little finints and all executive esteem for good works. In the inter respect the passages in Homess on worte, fasth and ment-of which he lasted to see the real meaning—became dangerous rocks on which Lather's earlier religious conventions suffered hopeless shipstreek. So greatly was he attracted and, as it were, inconsted by the light that memod to him to stream in on his soul from this Epistle. that he came to see the same thing everywhere. Its suggestive power over him was all the greater because in his their pseudomystical train of thought he was fond of comparing himself to the Apnetic and of inneying, that, so in that case so in his, inner solf-arraidalation would lead to his receiving maillar invours from God. This self semihilation in Lather's come was, however, a morbid one

Luther, as her younger days, had also been greevously tormented with thoughts on predestantion. He now fascard, according to what he supposed was limit a teaching, that to abandon opened in the hands of God, without will, strength or wish, was the sole means by which he and all other men could find tranquility. Thus, on the strength of misunderstood inward experiences, he haded the Equation to the Reimann and, a little later, the Equation to the Galatiana, as the only guide along the strange paths of his future emogecia.

His expressed "expensence of God" became the ruling power by which, thanks to an exercise entirely new, he was to bring solvation to the whole of mankind.

Hitherto, in spate of all his dalignme in the study of the Bible, any idea of upholding his own new interpretation against the existing destricts of the Church had been altogether ferrign to him. In his first manuscript notes and in the Commentary on the Pealma which has only recently come to light, linewise in his earlier sermons, he still leads at everything from the Catholic standpoint, the Church's authority is still the acquired guardian and interpreter of Holy Scripture. There the Ruble is to him unquestionably the divine y inspired book and the true Word of God, though it is, not the individual's, but the Church's duty to draw from its mexhaustible treasures arguments in her own defence and in refutation of the teaching of the heretics. To the teaching of Scripture and to the infalkble interpretation of the Church based on the tradition of the Fathers, everyone, so he then held, must submit as Church had ordered.

Even that, however, he was niready convinced that he had received an extraordinary call to deal with Hely Scripture. The very admiration of his fellow-monks for his familiarity with his red leather copy of the Bible, featured the self-love of the yeathful student of the Scriptures. This Staupitz mercaned by his accounts reference to the future "great Doctor," and by his governs treatment of Luther. The written Word of God is which the wide-awake and quick witted monks felt becaute in home more than any of his follows quite evidently became so much his ewn previous domain, that, in his opinion, Hibis arbeitarship was the only worthy form of theological learning and ruled every branch of Divine knowledge. Its even went further, attributing all the corruption in the Church to " neglect of the Word, i.e. to ignorance of and want of compliance with the B bio Word. On the strength of his accounted protognated knowledge of the "Word," he also reproves the holy-byworks." Even previous to the lectures on Romans, his conviction of the autahous between human works and Christ a grace made him read everywhere Christ into himsture; the Biale, so he says, must be taken in the well soring, i.e. to the Cross of Christ, having done which we may then be " quite certain to entch 'sta true meaning. Before Luthern day others in the Church had done the same, though within lawful bruta. Among contemporary Humanista even Ecosmus had insuted on Christia being made the centre of Scripture.

428

Widely as Lather, in his Communitary on Romans, already diverges from the Church's interpretative of Bt. Paul regarding the doctrine of Justidention, yet he will takents, at least in theory, the priori de of authority both in the interpretation of the Bible and in general. He rejects without communition all those between which deviate from the Church's guidance. In practice, however, he sets himself alove the teaching of the Pathers whereever the runs counter to be views, Mt. Augustine in forced to extress in his levour even at the expense of the other representatives of tradition, and, as for mediaval arbidenticism, it is treated as though it were not at one of the links in the views at is chain of tradition. On the other hand, Luther allows his engineerin of arbidenticism with whom alone he was acquainted.

On such bree as three did his exercise of the Bible proceed; in the case hand there was his exercise regard for his own arquantance with Respitue, and, on the other, his postdomysticism learing for its support on measuremented interior revelations and illustrations. A certain state of his vocation in the Columbias of the Bible gree accompanion him from that time forward.

This psychological condition manifests steelf in utterances contained in the lectures on Romans and in later works.

"Here," so he writes in the lectures, "a great stride has been made towards the right feterpertation of Holy Serieture, by anderstanding it all as bearing on Christ... even when the surface-mass of the letter does not require it." "All forepture

^{*} On the atgeograph of the introcal innours of Erromas and of Reachin, Zwingli did cust accupae to cari as to queste in Luting a nearth in that 4 was its who draw "the Babis out from under the bench." " Zwinglin Werke " (1828 ft.), Z. 2, p. 21.

[•] See our vol. i., p. 224 f.

^{*} Lectures on this hypothetic to the Romana, I. Let S. 6, ed. J. Echet, 1908, Glomen, p. 4.

deals everywhere with Christ alone." All this is said, written or done that human presumption may be humbled and the grace of God exalted." He is ever reading his own thoughts into the oftentumes obscure words of St. Paul, though, that he is no doing is evident neither to his hearers nor to himself. That name elequence and wealth of imagery are to be found here which are to the rectionse his later expositions. "Quite unmetalcably his language, thought and imagery throughout the work is that of the mystic," remarks the editor of the Commentary. "How much Taaler—whom Luther extels so highly even when as yet he was so little acquainted with him—has taken possession of Lather's mind and influences his language, would be clear from the Commentary on Romans, even were Tauler's mine not mentioned in it."

With the mental attitude assumed quite early in his career the scant regard for Humanian and philosophy he ownces in this Commentary well agrees; further, his use of the Bible as a whop with which to lash unsparingly the abuses rampant in the Church, another pseuharity which was to remain in his treatment of Scripture. The better to appreciate his first attempts at exegons we may recall, that, even then, he was concurred for the text and its parity, and that, no somer was Erasmus's Greek addition of the New Testament published, than Lather, who had now reached chapter ix, of the Epistle, began to use it for his lectures.

That Luther's first attempts in the exceptical field were so successful was in great part due to his personal gifts, to his oloquence and to his frankness. Oldecop, a pupil of his, who remained true to the Church, wrote as an old man, that, being as he was then twenty-two years of age, he "had taken pleasure in attending Martin a jectures." The lectures on Homana commenced immediately after Olderop's matriculation. Christopher Beheurl, the Humanist Professor of Law, reckoned the new exagete among the heat of the Wittenherg theologisms and earl: "Martin Luther, the Augustinian, expounds St. Paul's Epistles with marvellous talent."

In the matter of private interpretation as against the Church's, in these earliest exceptical efforts, he remained, outwardly at least, true to the trachtional standpoint, until, little by little, he forsook it, as already described (above, p. 387 ff.). Even his academic Theses of Sept., 1517 ("Against the Theology of the Schools"), based though they were on a misapprehension of Scripture, conclude with the

⁸ Ibid., Scholin, p. 840 : "Universit acriptura de auto Christo est ubique."

I Ideal., p. 253. 4 Ideal., Introduction, p. Ixil.

<sup>Joid., p. lv., and vol. i., p. 242 f.
Quoted by Ficker, p. lvii.
"Scheurje Benefbuch," od. Soden and Knasko, 3, p. 2; Ficker, sbid., p. lxv.</sup> assurance, that, "throughout, he neither intended nor had said anything contrary to the Church or at variance with her doctrines."3....Then, however, with startling suddenness the change set in.

When, after the atorm aroused by the publication of the Indalgence Theses, he wrote his German "Sermon von dem Ablass und Gnade," he appealed in it repeatedly to the Bible as against the "new teachers," i.e. the Schoolmen, and indeed in as confident a manner as though he alone were learned in Sempture. He says on the first page: "This I say: That it cannot be proved from any Scripture, etc. Much should I like to hear anyone who can testify to the contrary in spite of the fact that some doctors have thought so." And at the end he sums up as follows: "On these points I have no doubt, and they have sufficient warrant in Scripture. Therefore you too should have no doubt and send the Scholastic doctors about their business!" Shortly before this, in a letter about the Scholastic theologians of his day, particularly those of Leipzig, he declares: "I could almost swear that they understand not a single chapter of the Gospel or Bible."3 He was, however, greatly cheered to hear that, thanks to his new interpretation of the Bible, prelates, as well as the burghers of Wittenberg, were all saying "that formerly they had neither known nor heard anything of Christ or of His Gospel."4

After Tetzel had attacked his Sermon and accused Luther of faisifying the sacred text, and of cherishing heretical opinions, the latter indited his " Eyn Freiheyt dess Sermons Bejistli, hen Ablass und Gnad belangend," where he emphasises even more strongly and pathetically the supremacy of Holy Scripture over all outward authority: "Even though all these and a thousand others of the holiest of doctors had held this or that, yet their opinion is of no account compared with a single verse of Holy Writ. . . . They are not in the least to be believed, because the Sempture says: The Word of God no one may set ande or alter."

Carlstodt, whom Luther himself had instructed, outdid

^{5 &}quot;Werke," Worm, ed., 1, p. 228., "Opp. lat var.," 1, p. 221. F I and .p. 239 H ; Erl. ed., 27, p. 4 ff

To Johann Sylvint Egranus, March 24, 1518, "Briefwechsel," 1.

To Jodocus Trutvetter, May 9, 1518, ibid., p. 186. Werke, Weam ed., I, p. 3844. Erl. ed., 27, p. 124.

his master and advocated entire freedom for the private interpretation of Scripture before Luther could make up his mind to do this. He did not shrink from making his own the following defiant Thesis: "The text of the Bible does not take precedence merely of one or several Doctors of the Church, but even of the authority of the whole Church."1 It was only after Luther, thanks to his obstinacy and curious methods of reasoning, had extricated himself from his examination at Augsburg, and fled, that he admitted in the statements already given (p. 888) that the word of Scripture was to be set in the first place, and, that, in its interpretation, no account need be made of ecclesiastical authority.2 This prelude to Luther's new exceptical standpoint, more particularly towards the end, was marked by much fear, doubt and anxiety of conscience. He was worried, to such an extent that his "heart quaked for fear," by a number of Scripture passages and still more by the question: Could the Author of Seripture hitherto have really left. His work open to such dire misunderstanding?

While his powerful rhetoric, particularly when it came to polemies, was able to conecal all the failings of his exposition of the Bible, his real eloquence, his fervour and his popular ways of dealing with non-controversial things imparted to his pulpit-commentaries no less than to his written ones a freshness of tone which improved, atimulated and inspired his followers with love for Holy Sempture and also brought them Bible consolation amidst the trials of life.

3. The Sola Fides. Justification and Assurance of Salvation

The two propositions considered above, fundamental though they are, of the Bible being under the enlightenment of the Spirit the sole rule of faith, and of the untrustworthiness of ceclesiastical authority and tradition, far from having been the first elements to find their place in Luther's scheme, were only advanced by him at a later date and in order to protect his pet dogma.

His doctrine of Justification was the outcome of his dishke for "holiness-by-works," which led him to the theory of salvation by faith alone, through the imputation of the ments of Christ without any co-operation on man's part, or any human works of ment. This doctrine, from the very first as well as later, was everything to him. This it was which he made it his earliest task to elaborate, and about it he then proceeded to hang the other theories into which he was forced by his conflict with the Church and her teaching, some of which were logically connected with his main article, whilst, in the case of others, the connection was only artificial. Later exponents of Lutheranism termed his doctrine of Justification the material principle of his theology, no doubt in the same sense as he himself reckons it, in a sermon of 1589 in his postula, as: "the only element, article or doctrine by which we become Christians and are called such."

³ Löscher, " Reformationsacta," 2, p. 80.

^{*} In the postsempt to the " Acta Augustana," "Werke "Weins, ed., 2, pp. 18, 21 f.; "Opp. lat. var.," 2, pp. 385 seq., 391 seq.

This Evangel, Luther's consoling doctrine, as a matter of fact was simply the record of his own inner past, the most subjective doctrine assuredly that ever sought to enlist followers. As we know, it is already found entire in his Commentary on Romans of 1515-1516.

In order to strengthen, in himself first and then in others, the assurance of salvation it comprised, he amplified it by asserting the believer's absolute certainty of salvation; this was lacking in his Commentary on Romans, though even then he was drifting towards it. It was only in 1518–1519 that he developed the doctrine of the so-called "special faith," by which the individual assures himself of pardon and secures salvation. Thereby he transformed faith into trust, for what he termed fiducial faith partook more of the nature of a strong, artificially stimulated hope; it really amounted to an intense confidence that the ments of Christ obliterated every sin.

Of faith in this new sense he says that it is the faith. "To have the Faith is assentingly to accept the promises of God, laying hold on God's gracious disposition towards us and trusting in it." In spite of this he continues in the old style to define faith as the submission of reason to all the truths revealed, and even to make it the practical basis of all his religious demands: Whoever throws overboard

³ "Colloq,," ed. Bindself, 1, p. 54. Cp, "Werks," Erl, ed., 15⁴, p. 542, and "Disputationes," ed. Drews, p. 640. Desilio-Wess, 1⁴, pp. 672, 6-5, 727 st.

even one single article of faith will be damned: faith being one whole, every article must be believed.1 We can understand how opponents within his own camp, of whom he demanded faith in the doctrines he had discovered in the Bible, when they themselves failed to find them there. ventured to remind him of his first definition of faith, viz. the fiducial, and to ask him whether a trustful appropriation of the ments of Christ did not really meet all the demands of "faith." Recent Protestant biographers of Luther point out that Zwingli was quite justified in urging this against Luther. Attacked by Luther on account of his discordant teaching on the Lord's Supper, and that on the score of faith, Zwingli rudely retorted: " It is a pestilential doctrine, by a perversion of the word faith which really means trust in Christ, to lower it to the level of an opinion"; with this behaviour on Luther's part went "hand in hand a similar change in his conception of the Church founded on faith. 18

Some Characteristics of the New Doctrine of Justification.

If we take Luther's saving faith we find that, according to him, it produces justification without the help of any other work or act on man's part, and without contrition or charity contributing anything to the appropriation of rightcoursess on the part of the man to be justified.

Any contrition proceeding from the love of God, or at least from that incipient love of God such as Catholicism required agreeably with both revelation and human psychology, appeared to Luther superfluous; in view of the power of man's ingrained concupiscence it amounted almost to a contradiction; only the fear of God's Judgments ("timor serviles"), so he declares (vol. i., p. 291), with pulpable exaggeration, had ruled his own confessions made in the monastery. At any rate, he was in error when he declared that this same fear had been the motive in the case of Catholies generally. He persuaded himself that this fear must be overcome by the Evangel of the imputed ments of Christ, because otherwise man can find no peace. The part played by the law is, according to him, almost confined to threatening and reducing man to despair, just as he himself had so often verged on hopelessness through thinking of his own inevitable reprobation; the assurance of salvation by faith, however, appears to every Christian as an angel of help and consolation even minus any repudiation of sin on the part of man's will, for, owing to the Fall, sin cannot but persist.

Thus A. Berger, "M. Luther," TI 2, pp. 98, 100. Cp. this author's view (on p. 100): "This means an obscuring and improvembing of the faith as discovered and laid down by himself." The following observation of Berger's in remarkable. "Luther, as theologian, was merely the restorer of prameval Christianity, such as he understood it j Zwingh, however, understood it otherwise." (p. 102).

¹ Cp., in "Luthers Werks in Auswahl," ed. Buchwald, 2 suppl., 1965, p. 63, O. Scheel's remarks on the writing "De votis monation" (Weim ed., 5, p. 583; "Opp. lat, var.," 6, p. 252), where Luther says that whoever denies the virginity of Mary plays haves with the whole faith.

When he attempts to prove this by his "experiences," we must remind the reader how uncertain his statements are, concerning his own "inward feelings" during his monastic days. It will be pointed out elsewhere (vol. vi., xxxvii.) that these "recollections," with their polemical animus, were of comparatively late growth, though they would have been of far greater service at the outset when still quite fresh.

A more solid basis for estimating the value of his doctrine of Justification is afforded by its connection with his other theological views. As we know, he regarded original sinand the concupacence resulting from it as actual sin, still persisting in spite of baptism; he exaggerated beyond measure man's powerlessness to withstand the concupiscence which remains with him to the end. Owing to the unfreedom of the will, the devil, according to Luther, holds the field in man's heart and rules over all his spiritual faculties. The Divine Omaipotence alone is able to vanguish this redoubtable master by bestowing on the unhappy soul pardon and salvation; yet sin still reigns in the depths of the heart. No act of man has any part in the work of salvation. Actual grace is no less unknown to him than sanctifying grace. Good works are of no avail for sulvation and of no importance for heaven, though, accidentally, they may accompany the state of grace, God working them in the man on whom He has cast His eye by choosing him to be a recipient of faith and salvation. Such election and predestination is, however, purely God's work which man himself can do absolutely nothing to deserve.-Thanks to these errors, the "sole fides" and assurance of salvation stand bereft of their theological support.

UNFREEDOM AND IMPUTATION 485

We must, however, revert to one point again and examine it more closely on account of its historical and psychological importance. This is Luther's doctrine of the slavery of the will, and of God's being the sole agent in man.

This doctrine, already expressed in his Commentary on Romans in connection with his comion on unconditional predestination,1 he was afterwards to expound with increasing volumence.* He was delighted to find his rigid views expressed in the Notes of the lectures on Romans and 1 Correthians, which Melanchthon delivered in 1521 and 1522. These Notes he eased to be printed, and sent them to the author with a profess rast in the form of a letter *

In this letter he assumes the whole responsibility for the publication, and assures Melanchthon that "no one has written better than you on Paul." "I hold that the Commentaries of Jerome and Origins are the mariet nonessee and rabbuh compared with your exposition . They, and Thomas too, wrote commentance that are filled with their own concerts rather than with that which is Paul's or Christ's, whereas on the contrary yours teaches us how to read Scripture and to know Christ, and thus excele any mere commentary, which is more than one can may of the others hitherto in vogue.

Buch praise for Melanchthon's work, indirectly intended to recoil upon his own doctrons, essend Ersenus to remark of the

Preface: "How full of peids it is! "4

The doctrine of the unfreedom of the will as here expressed by Melanchthon who then was still the true mouthpiece of Luther, though free from Luther's rhotorical exaggerations, respanse extremely hareh.

It contains, for instance, the following propositions: " Everything in every creature occurs of necessity. , . , It must be firmly held that everything, both good and bad, is done by Gorl." "God does not merely allow His creatures to act, but it is He Himself Who acts." As He does what m good, so also He does what is indifferent in man, such as easing and drinking and the other enguel functions, and also what is eval, "nuch as David's actultery and Manhus a execution of his son." The treason of Judge was not merely permatted of God, but, as Augustine says, was the effect of His power. "It is a huge blaspiterny to deay

Letter of March 18, 1889. Cp. "Zeitsehr für KG.," S. p. 191.

Res vol i p. 193.
 Res vol ii. p. 223 ff.
 Ph. Melanchthonis Agnotations in Epistolas Paus ad Rhemanns. et Counthius," Normberge, 1522. The later editions are quoted in "Corp ref." [5, p. 441. In this volume Binders has not reprinted the writing owing to Melanchthon's retractation of it (see next page), It should, however, have been printed as an historical denument — The introductory preface, in "Brists," 2, p. 239, dated July 29, 1522 ("Bristweeheel," 2, p. 438) productions the actuality of which we have briefly proved above. '8

Ten years inter Melanchthon had grown shy of views so monetrous, he thought it advantable to reputints this book, and, in 1532, he dedicated a new Commentary on Hornara to the Archbehop of Mavenes, whom he was anxious to wis ever. In the preface he mays, that he no longer acknowledged (" plans non agreece ")" the earlier work which had appeared under his name. Letter, after Listher's death, he went so for as to demand the never punishment of those who denied free-will and questioned the need of good works for salvation."

Lather, on the other hand, as we know, never reinquished his stradpoint on the doctrine of free-will. Bende his statements already quoted may be put the following: The will is not only unfree." in everything," but is no greatly depressed by original ten, that, not content with being entirely passive in the matter of Justification, it actually remote God take the devil. "What I my is, that the spiritual powers are not marrly depressed, but altogether anishisated by un, not main in roas than in the devils. . . . Their reason and their will well those things alone which are opposed to God. Whatever is in our will is evil and whatever to in our reason is more error and bindness. Thus, is things Divine, was morthing but darkness, error and depressity, his will is evil and his understanding nowhere."

* Owing to the energy of the work, to which seem the efficie of the "Breefree had " had not access, we give an Latin the passages releved to from the copy unchannel in the Hunth State Library: H I's " Hereingra summe even only in manifest creatures. — Itaque of has were discusse, a State for union from from query make. "H I's " Hen were discusse, then arises permitted from the experiment of epicentus, and specific accounts and property agent, and seems from the group and from the construction of factority agents for property and and accounts? It considers, to be constructed as a seed for the factority of the first and formation of patential and formation of patential, it for the constructed, the second property and property and products and formation, the angular as write advance, the of our property appeal had produce and Pauli, mention of the — For Melanchthonia atalogues in his "Lam" of the Lastheran denial of free-will, no always, vol. 11. p. 346.

* Strep ref 7 15, p. 441.

Melarichthan in his letter in the Florier August of Savony April, 1550. N. Panius, "Letter und die Gommensfreinst," Munich, 1866, p. 52 f. Op. above, vol. ni., p. 347.

4 See vo. ii., p. 265.

* Comm to Fr ad Gal,* 1835 weld, p. 295. The iffe-Weins, 18 p. 514. On Leither's Series of 1523 on the Frent of the Circumsworm, "Works." Weins, ed., 10, 1, 1, p. 508; Ed. ad., 185, p. 199; It said been shown long before by the tratitution of circumsususes." I had no our court evach God and he acoust by works but only by faith. This is insisted upon throughout the whole of Series by tenching and example. Bit is us is not merely a work or deed, but our said nature and connece; for the reason does not nature is perpetuated." On the same page we find the following. "Nature is depended through and through so that no will in set for what is good."; "our nature is

UNFREEDOM AND IMPUTATION 487

From such a standpoint all that was possible was a mere outward imputation of the ments of Christ, no Justification in the sense in which it was taken by the ancient Church, viz. as a supernatural regeneration by means of sanctifying

Any reliable proofs, theological or biblical, in support of this altogether novel view of Justification will be sought for in vain in the works of Melanchthon and Luther. When Luther speaks of the power of faith in the merits of Christ and of the promises of faith concerning eternal life, as he does, for instance, in the written defence which he handed to Cardinal Cajetan at Augsburg, his words and the Bible passages he quotes merely express what the Church had always taught concerning the necessity and efficacy of faith as the condition of the supernatural life to be further developed in the soul by God's Grace and man's co-operation. In spite of this, in that very writing he alleges that he has satisfactorily proved that Justification is effected by fiducial faith.

" No one can be justified." he there writes. " but by faith. in the sense that he must needs believe with a firm faith ("certa fide credere") that he is justified, and not doubt in any way that he is to attain to grace; for if he doubts and is uncertain, he will not be justified, rather he spits out the grace."2

His doctrine of faith alone and of the imputed ments of Christ, was, of all his theological opinions, the one which underwent the least change during his lifetime 3. Until old age he continued to lay great stress on it both in the University Disputations and in his sermons and writings. Even the inferences drawn from it by Johann Agricola in his Antinomian theses did not cause Luther to waver in the least.

all possened and crammed with ain," etc. - The sermon in which the singularly outspoken statement concerning circumctation occurs is also found in the postule. Some unbecoming language is also met at the commencement of the passage in question where Luther says; "It m quite true that God's works and commandments are fully to nature and reason; God a way of acting is mad enough"; Luther, however, hastens to add, "but if we keep our heads and look into it attentively, we shall soon see that all is done in the wiscet mariner,"

Document of Oct. 14, 1518, "Briefwechiel," 1 (p. 250 ff.), p. 266 ff.

Document of Oct. 14.
 Cp. our vol. i., p. 384.
 Cp. Kösthu, "Luthers Theol.," 21, p. 175, on passages duting
 Cp. Kösthu, "Luthers Theol.," 21, p. 175, on passages duting 1512 and 1539.
 "Disputationes," pp. 429, 431 (of 1638). from 1532 and 1539.

In the Schmalkalden Articles he declares explicitly that Justification consists merely in God's "looking upon" the sinner " as righteous and holy." According to one of his sermons our righteousness comes " altogether from without and rests solely on Christ and His work"; 1 elsewhere he says, with the utmost assurance: The Christian is "nghteous and holy by virtue of a foreign or outward holiness."*

In view of such statements undue stress must not be laid on that Luther says in another passage, which recalls the teaching of the olden Church, viz. that the Spirit of God dwells in the righteous, and fills him with His gifts, may, with His very "substance," and that it was this Spirit which gave him the " feeling and the certainty " of being in a state of grace. This is much the same as when Luther describes man's active love of God whereby he becomes united and "one kitchen" with God, whilst, nevertheless, insisting that the strength of the sola fides must never be the least diminished by work. "No work enust be added to this " (to faith), he says in his postile, " for whoever preaches that guilt and penalty can be atoned for by works has already denied the Evangel.' Only at times does he allow himself to follow the voice of nature speaking on behalf of man's co-operation; this he does, for instance, in the passage just referred to, where he admits that human reason is ever inviting man to take a share in working out his salvation by means of his own works.

The forgiveness which God offers "must be seized and believed. If you believe it you are rid of an and all is nght," "This all the Gospels teach." Unfortunately there are "many abandoned people who misuse the Gospel

Werke," Erl. ed., 251, p. 202.

^{*} Ibid., 2°, p. 207.
* "Opp. lat. exeg.," 19, p. 43 erg.: "fusius et sanctus aliena seu extrinorca canctitate."

Ibid., 10, p. 110: "non tantum per done, sed quoad substantam."

[•] Op. the passages in Kosthe, stat., p. 201 f.

^{*} Werke, Er ed., 18, p. 312.

* Ibid., 14, p. 287. In the light of this we can better understand the words which occur quite early in a writing of Luther's: "Nonensite agendo moto efficiente, as Aristot e taught, but moto fendo el essendo operamier moto. ' To Spaintin, Oct. 19, 1516, "Briefwechsel,"

p. 64. See below, xxviii., 6.
 "Werks." Eri. ed., 14³, p. 285 f.
 Ibid., p. 282. Cp. above, vol. iii., p. 226 f. abo pp. 181 ff., 186 f 194.

AUGUSTINE'S "LACK OF CLEARNESS" 489

. . . who think that no one must punish them because the Gospel preaches nothing but forgiveness of sins. To such the Gospei is not preached. . . . To whom is it preached? To those who feel their misery," i.e. to those who are munk in remorse of conscience and in fears, similar to, or at least faintly resembling, those he had himself once endured. When he applies the words of Psalm 50 to the yearning, the prayers and the struggles of those who thirst for salvation: "A contrite and himbled heart, O God, Thou wilt not despine," he finds himself again, all unconsciously, on the road to the Church's olden view on man's share in repent-ACCRECATE VALUE OF THE PARTY.

What we read in the important notes "De isstifications," written during Luther's stay in the fortress of Coburg and only recently published, differs not at all from his ordinary, purely mechanical view of Justification.2 These notes are from Luther's amanueusis, Veit Dietrich, and record some conversations concerning a work Luther had planned in reply to the objections against the new doctrine of Justification. Dietrich entitled the collection "Rhapsodia."

It to not surprising that at a later date Luther heatstand to appeal to St. Augustine in support of his doctrine so confidently as he once had done. Augustine and all the Doctors of the Church are decidedly against him. On the publication of the complete edition of his works in Latin Luther expressed himcell in the preface very diplomatically concerning Augustine: "In the matter of imputation he does not explain everything clearly." A Naturally the greatest teacher on grace, who lays each stress on its supernatural character and its gifts in the soul of the righteous, could not fad to dissures with him, seeing that Luther a system culminator in the seammance, that grace is the merest imputation is which man has no active share, a mere favour on God's part, ' favor Del.''s

Augustine's views of the powers and the ead of man in the natural as well as the superintural order have been clearly set forth in their connection with the trend of present-day scholar-

1 "Werke "Werm ed., 30 2 p. 652. First published by G. Borbig.

"Opp. let. var.," I, p. 23: "De impulatione non clare ominio [&]quot;Der Veil Dietrich-Codex in der Kurnh, Stanibibauthek," 1905.

Cp. Demfle-Weum, 1!, p. 521.

1 Cp. Th. Kolde in the Berte a. Bayerschen K.G.," 14, 1906. p. 139 ft. Kolde rightly refers Luther's words to Melanchiton, viz. that he would send him a writing, on soir! Christian, de matricestionie foco." (Aug. 24, 1630, from the fortress of Coburg, "Briefwee seil. It. p. 204), to the above work, and designees with Eudess remark on the ship by an eminent Catholic researcher. The latter points out that a strong revulsion against Lather's idea of outward imputation has shown itself in Protestantism, and that the "historical theology" of our day largely acknowledges the existence of the Catholic doctrine "in the olden ecclematical and, indeed, even in the New-Testament world." The same holds good of Augustine as of Paul. "Not the 'solo fides,' but the renewal of the interior man, a "true and real new creation," was the easence of Paul's doctrine of justification."

The Striving after Absolute Certainty of Salvation.

Luther was chiefly concerned in emphasising the indispensable necessity of particular faith in personal justification and personal salvation.

Whereas the Church had required faith in our real, objective redemption by Christ, Luther demanded over and above a further faith in one's subjective redemption, in spite of the difficulty which circumstances might present to the attaining of this assurance. It was something very different when the olden theologians taught that there were signs from which the good man's state of grace might be inferred with moral certainty, and that such signs were, for instance, the determination to commit no greevous sin, the desire to perform good works more especially such as were difficult, joy and peace of soul in God, and, above all, the consciousness of having done everything that was necessary for reconciliation with God. That, by such marks, it was "possible to arrive at the practical certainty of being in a state of grace " had been taught by Gabnel Biel, with whom Luther was acquainted. Later on, the Council of Trent. laid down as the Catholic doctrine, against the Lutheran. theory of absolute faith in personal justification, "that no good Christian may doubt of the mercy of God, of the merits of Christ or the efficacy of grace," but that at the same time "no one can know with the certainty of faith which precludes all possibility of error that he has attained to God's grace."*

Luther's teaching was quite different.

He writes, for instance, in the larger Commentary on Galatians, which, as we know, he regarded next to his work "De serve arburio" as his principal legacy to posterity: "We must

J. Manabach, "Die Ethik des hl. Augustanus," 2, 1909, p. 98.
 Cp. Denitle-Weiss, ibid., p. 742, n. 3.
 Sees, VI. c. 9.

THE STRIVING AFTER CERTAINTY 441

erroive and recognise it as cortain that we are the temple of the Holy Choot."1 . "The heart must be quite sectain that it is in a state of grace and that it has the Holy Chost."4. It is true, he enys, that, "because we feel the opposite centiments of feer, doubt, sadness, etc., we fail to regard this as certain." Yet do thes we must; "We must day by day struggle ('Auciers')* towards greater and greater certainty." We should exercise ourselves in the feeling of certainty, rick something to occurs it; for it rests with our own saif-acquired ability to believe ever firmly and steadfastly, even as we believe the truths of facth, that we are really justified. All depends on the practice and expensence just referred to. "This matter, if it is to be achieved, cannot be learnt without experience. Everyone should therefore accustom himself resolutely to the persuasion that he is in a state of grace and that his person and deeds are pleasing [to God L. Should be feel a doubt, then let him execuse faith; he must best down his doubts and acquire certainty, so as to be able to say . I know that I am pleasing (to God) and have the Holy Ghost, not on account of any worth or ments of my own, but on account of Cheet, Who for our sakes submitted Humself to the low and took away the star of the world. In Him I believe." * " The greatest art consists in this, that, regardless of the fact that we commit un, we can yet say to the law : I am unless." *

"And even when we have fought very hard for this, it will still cost us much sweat."

It is thus that Luther was led to speak from his own frace experience, of which we have plentiful corroboration. In the passage last quoted, he proceeds: "The matter of justification is difficult and delicate ("cause fustifications subjects set"), not indeed in itself, for in itself it is an certain as can be, but in our regard; of this I have frequent experience."

We are already acquainted to some extent with the struggle against himself, and the better voices within him, which the unhappy man had to wage; this distress of soul remains to be treated of more in detail later (vol. v., xxxii). It may, however, be pointed out here that he knew how to make this struggle part of his system; even when depressed by one's painful inability to reach this unshaken consciousness of salvation he still insists that one must feel certain; faced by doubts and fears on account of his sins, man must summon defiance to his aid, then, finally, he will come to rest secure of his personal salvation.

In Ep. ad, Gal., 2 g. 161.
 Ibid., p. 164.
 Ibid., p. 166.
 Cp. above, p. 437, and vol. 1, p. 386 ff. on this sectamety of faith.

[&]quot;In Ep ad. Gal.," 2, p. 186.
Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 201.
"In Ep. ad. Gal.," 1, p. 101.

" We must cling with all surenous to the heliof that not merely our office but also our person is well pleasing to God "1. It is true that mon see, " how weak is the faith even of the pious. We would amuroily joyfully give thanks to God for His unspeakable gift could we but say with entire certainty. Yes, indeed, I am in a state of grace, my am is forgiven me, I have the Spirit of Christ and I am the son of God. We feel however, in ourselves emotions quite contrary, vis. fear, doubt, indoess, etc., hence we do not venture to make the amertion,"1. Others might infer from this the inclosions of all such your efforts. Lather, however, would not be the man he is were he not to declare: On the contrary, " we must dutly straiggle more and more from un-cornainty to certainty?" "Christ Himself," so he argues, " is Quite certain in His Spirit that He is pleasing to God. . . . Hence we too, seeing that we have the Spirit of Christ, must be certain that we too stand in grave . . . on account of Ham Who is

The last argument is the more noteworthy in that it demonstrates so wed the vicious circle involved in Luther a conclusion.

It amounts to thus: In order to pussess grace and reconciletion you must believe that you have grace and reconciliation. What guarantee has one of the certainty of this behet? Nothing but the inward consciousness to be evolved in the soul that it has indeed the grace of Christ which covers over all that is evil in it.

An Listher says, " If you are to be saved you must be so sure within yourself of the Word of grace, that even were all men to may the contrary, you all the angels to deny it, you could yet stand alone and say: I know this Word is true."

In practice, nevertheless, Luther was content with very little in the matter of this strength of cortitude: "If I have Him [Christ], I am sure that I have everything, . . . What is still wanting in me is, that I cannot yet group it or believe it perfectly. So far as I am able now to grasp it and believe it, so far do I possess it, and if I stick to it this will go on increasing." But atill there remains an outward feeling of death, of hell, of the devil, of an and of the law. Even though you feel that it is morely a warfare that seeks to hinder you from attaining to life everlasting . . . We should say I believe in Christ Jesus, Re is rains, and so far as I have Him and believe in Him, thus far am I prous." - "Yet believe it I carnot."

Luther, according to the legend which he evolved later when defending his doctrine of faith more and Justification, had started from the intense inward need he felt of certainty of salvation, and with the object, as he says, of "finding a Gracious God." By his discovery regarding Justification, Above, vol. in., pp. 202 ff., 226.

Ibid., 2, p. 164. Ibid., p. 145. 6 "Werke" Ed ad , 17% p. 230. * "Werke," Werm ed., 32, p. 163; Err. ed., 47, p. 369.

THE STRIVING AFTER CERTAINTY 443

so his admirers say, he at last found and retained for the rest of his life the sense of a merciful God. The strange thing is, however, that in his severe and protracted straggles of conscience he should, at a later date, have again arrived at this very question. "How can I find a Gracious God?"

He written in 1627 to Melanchthan: "Like a wretched, reprodute worm I am molected by the spirit of exchesis I dence suthing and theret after nothing but a Gracious God." So greatly was he involved in inward contests that he mays : " I am mayon able to drug on my existence; of working or writing I dore not think " ! Setan a busy, he exclaims to his friend. Wenceslaus Link during these storms, " and would fain make it implemente for me to write. The wants to drag me down to him at hell. May God trend him under foot. Amen | "1

With very many of his followers the assurance of salvation facing to hold good in the presence of death. "We not only do not feel it this senarance]," so he makes them my, " but rather the contrary . He admits the phenomenon and seeks to account for it; may, in his usual way, he makes capital out of it. " In God's sight," he says, " the matter is indeed so [i.e. as promised by his directions of Junicipeation), but not yet in our eyes and in those of the world; hence our fours still parent until we are remained by double."* Whoever feels weak lot him coursels historif with that, that no one accounts perfectly in this (in the attenueses of cortainty)." That is one of the advantages empryed by hurstion," he crim, "to tall themselves in security. . . . Nothing is more problemsal than security. Hence, when you feel weak in the faith you must rouse yourself; it is a age of a good disprosture and of the fear of tied. -Readers of Luther must be propaged for sugprating statements.

It is true that he immerity betterly the increase of the fear of douth among the new benevure. In the case of sendences he seen to his regret that everybody is " seared and taken to fight." Far. greater trian ever under Pepery, so he says, "as now, under the strong light of the Evangel, men's fear of learng their life * * For this again he has an explanation to hand. When, for instance, the plague spread to Wittenberg in 1538 he wrote: Whence comme all this fear to "Formerly under Popery, the people were not so much alread. The reason is this: In Popery we treated in the monte of the monks and of others, but now each one has to trust to and depend on humself " A new yers, with the same object of remaring himself and others, he mys: The Evangel

Oct. 27, 1627, "Briefwechsel," 6, p. 109. N. v 22 1827 " Brudwort sel," 6, p 121.

Density Wood, 1884, p. 738, p. 184 erg., in the exposition of lander, 1832, Density Wood, 1884, p. 738, p. 1.

Ibul., p. 143. Denife-Weses, ibed., n. 2.
 Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 188.
 Te Wenceshum Link, Oct. 26, 1830, "Bracke," 5, p. 219.

with its clear light of truth causes the holosom of God to be better percurved and thus leaves more room for the sense of fear. This he here reckons as an advantage over Popery, though, as a rule, his grievance against Catholiciam had been that it exerted fearmomeness by the gloomy legal spirit which prevailed in it and by its agreeing of God a many y -- We shall not he for wrong of we regard such statements as detailed more by psychological than by theological considerations.

" it is a great thing, " says Luther, referring to his doctrine of forth plane, "to by claim to righteenstron; then man daren to ear. I are a one of God; whereas the state of grace affrights him. . . . Without practice ("assa practices") are one is able to regulater rightermines-by-works and to preach faith about."1 He bewaris "that we are too blind to be able to e-use upon the treasure of grace. . . . We return to cult experienc hely," in apité of the certainty which faith brangs us. Here cur apponents, the Papute and the Sacramentarians, are not awarly so well off; at heat they could not " quiet their conscience" in he could do by his method, bucques, owing to their works, they were always in doubt as to their own salvation. (At any rate, they were in no state of "post-leatest meanity,"). "They are always in doubt and wondering: Who knows whether it is really pleasing to tod? Yet they sling to works and "any Anathema to Jesus. "

I have to labour daily," he mys, "before I can bey hold on Christ ' : he adds : "That is due to force of hight, because for no many years (in Pricery) I looked upon Christ as a mere judge. It is an old, retian tree that is rooted in mn. . . . We have, however, now again reached the light; in my case this occurred when I was made a Ductor, . . . But know that, that Christ is test went to judge and to punish, not to bits and to stay singura us I used to fancy and as some still think."*

His extraordinary esteem for the new dortains of the power of forth alone and the assurance of mireteen, would furnish quite a tricle to one act aware of the constitution of his mand

He greatly cid he prise this doctrine, that, according to the testimony of Melanchthon, he referred to a all other articles of faith, even that of erention. "The article of the forgiveness of erro, he says, " so the foundation on which the article of the creation of the world rests, 4. " If we drop this article then we tray well despoir. The reason why heretics and fanatics [Pupots and no tanano] go astray is simply their ignorance of this doctrine. Without it it is impossible to envised with flaten and with Popery at al four to he vectoricus." !- Thealer to such statements as these Luther's article of Justification come to be termed the article on which the Church stands or folls.

[&]quot; Colloq ," ed. Burdeeil, 1, p. 63. " 16of., p. 57 sep.

^{*} Lutters ungedruckte Predigten," ed. G. Buche sid, 3, Leipzig. 1465, p. 50.

^{*} Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 201, "Colloq.," ed. Bindeesl, 1, p. 54.

The "Article on which the Church Stands or Falls": According to Modern Protestants.

Protestant scholars are far from sharing Luther's high regard for his dogma of Justification, and what they say throws a curious light on the fashion in which he deceived himself.

Amongst the Protestant worse rused in protest against that doctring, the following deserve to be not on record. It is clear, says K. Hass, that the Catholic doctrine is more closely related. to the "Protestant view now providing"; he avers, that the " Protestant the lugars of our day, even those who are sticking for the purity of Lathernaum, have described saving faith as that which works by love, quite agreeably to the echolestic conexption of the 'fider formate,' and have opposed to it a pretended Catholic dogma of Justification by good works."

This well known controversal writer when expressing it so his operates that Lather's doctars of Justification is now prochesily decarded, was not even at passe to exclude the conservative theologisms of the party . " Dollarger's a quien right in charging the so-raded field behavers, amongst us with having faden away from the Helormer's degme of Justification as strictly and theologically defined."

Thus obgiving meeting to be the tragge fate of Luther's great theological decovery, which, if we are to believe what he says, was to him the light of his existence and his most powerful incentive in his whole work, and which figured so precuretally in all his attacks on Home. Was it not this decirms which played the clief part in his belief in the utter exemption of the Church of earlier days, when, instead of pritting the grace of Christ, every hing was miscle to depend on worse, which had led to the run of Christendom, to the debasement of the clorgy and to the transfermation of the Pope into Antichrist ?

The one nationary of Sempture. Lather's other palladous, had already asfored sadly more the Revolution period, and now the doctrons of Justicenties seems doctined to a tile fate. Alter's Retachl was pronouncing a never ce main when he declared. " that, amongst the differences of openion prevalent in the ranks of the evergeteral thesiograms, the recognition of two propositions |the ene authorsty of Scripture and Justification by imputation) was the minimum that could be expected of snyone who washed to be considered Evengelscal."* For the fact is that the minimum required by Ritorhi, in, accepting to the admission of Protestant critics thumselves, frequently an longer held by Livrae theritograne.

Of the Lutherns dortrine of Justification here in question,

K. Hase, "Hibbh, dee prot. Polemak," p. 284.
 * Kirche und Kirchen," p. 428 f.

a " Kirche and Kirchen." p. 428 f. 4 " Geech, des Pestermus," 1, Burn, 1980, p. 34, * lord p. 261.

Of the actual theory of Luther, do Lagarde wrote come fifty years ago: "The doctrine of Justification (Luther's) is not the Evanger. . . . It was not the base principle of the Referention, and to day in the Protestant Churches it is quite dead." De Lagarde did not allow in medif to be mailed by the flowery language concerning personal religious experience which is all that remains of Luther's doctrine in many modern expositions of it."

"Hewarch in the domain of New-Testament history and in

* "Die Lehre von der Wiedergeburt, die ehreit Centralishen, in degmengeschicht, und mitgionogeschicht. Beleuchtung," Lasping, 190°, p. 229.

On the Confession of Angeburg and Meisnehthon's afterstors in Lathern teaching and on Meisnehthon's own change of views, ep. U. Krischl, "Der doppelte Rechtier anagsbegrift in der Apploges der Augsburgerten Kan-cason. (Zei schr. i. Licol. ii. Kirche," 1918, pp. 202-228).

"I Un de Lagards see "Theol. Revue," 1988, col. 348. G. Saurt, in his review there of Gerrich's work, penarts of the alleged "selgious experiences, religious that has to be lived and calmot be reduced to any formulae, and her again, experiences are discussed which have to be differentiated from others, vital experiences which must be accurately formulated, in short, a constant reviewing in a circle, and a language that is always vague." He not thus have had said: "What can the wird Justification ments to those who have last all idea of the super-matural and of grace, and have so changed the idea of faith that not hir g remains out a vague religious continent, a venture of the will to others the value of a higher world in the tace of worldly washous."

that of the Reformation," anys. K. Holl, "has arrived at conclassons crossly akin to de Lagarde s. . . . It has been made amponishin mmp.y to not the Protestant doctrine of Juntification on the energieval with the Paulies and with that of the Gospel of Jeous. Amongst the Protestant objections to the doctrine, he instances " its narrowness, which constitutes a limitation of the others insuspectable to present day tastes." He attempts to explicing or rather to amend. Lather's theory, so as to give others its due and to evade Luther's " paradex of a God, " Who, though incorrable in him moral demands, Hamself procures for the offender selection and life. As the new digma originally atoud Lieth ste Cotte he open-come and the Analogetate were at one in contends of that Luthern doctrine of Justification could not fail to lead to moral fax tv. Protestant theologians were not able to deny the weight of this obsection. In posts of fact it my objection. " as the only of or which there is no logical solution."

The same aut or writes elembers concerning the assurance of savation which, according to Lather, according to Lather, according to lighter, according to the lather, also believed the remarkable contradiction. All his life Lather allowed the remarkable contradiction to remain, not because it escaped his notice, but because he had no wish to remove at." Itself fields, moreover, in Lather a encourage on Presimination " the claims of the thoughts underlying his disctance of Justification "; " the stempth of purelying) faith has to be tested by one a randomn to submit even to the sentence [of dammatical]."

In conclusion we may eate what W. Kehler cave of the unrenormalization of Lather a denial of free will, according to which either God or the devil site astride man's back.

"With the rejection of man's pure possisty, or, as Lather save, of his being ridden by the Lord tool, Luther's theology suffers a set back and the Cathelie polaries of the 18th century receive a turky vindent of "Only along to bis "turky lack of legic" did Luther steer clear of the disastrous moral consequences of such a view, "in practice" he still laid stress on good works in spite of the danger that the "feeling of security" and the idea of "ambiguress aright lead people to such into the mire." His district bowever in stard leads "either to bis usual thought; We are someway after all, or to excrevegent process of the Living mercy which florgs "black sheep" into the "kingdom of grare."

¹  Das Bechtfertigungsiehen im Lichte der Gesch, des Protestantismus," 1906 ("Saminlung . . . Vorträge und Schriften aus dem Gemet der Theol.," No. 45), pp. 1, 2, 42, 10, 16.

Pin Best Gertan mai Lee in Lathers Variesurges after den Remerks of put her. He said to if the Frage mer Mongen school." I" Zattiche, f. Theol. and Karche," 1910, p. 245-f.), pp. 267-289.

("Zeitschr. f. Theol. und Kirche," 1910, p. 245 fl.), pp. 287, 289.

W. E. Ser, "KatroLaurium and Reformation," pp. 54 off. Off this feorestion O. Urmen remarks in the Zeitschr. f. KG.," 1919, p. 380.— These pages have attracted operal attention where Robine shows that, is the Cathelic enticism of Latiner a discrete of any atton, as arising to otheral requirements, there has a grain of track."

Evangeheal theologians generally are, however, full of admiration for the spirit in which Luther, thanks to his "inward experiences," convinced both himself and others of the certainty of Justification. His "experience of God" had at any rate reads him capable of as "heroic faith" and, by his "risking all for God," he pointed out to the religion of the heart the true road to contentment for all future time. Luther's doctrine of Justification was the "final deepening of the sense of personal religion." (K. Hod).

The objections on this point, raised against Luther in his own camp, are all the more significant seeing he made all religion to consist in the cloaking of sin and the pacifying assurance of forgiveness; his Evangel had come as a "solace for troubled consciences"; it is "nothing else but forgiveness, and is concerned only with sin, which it blots out, covers over, sweeps away and cleanses so long as we live." Thanks to it the long-forgotten true conception of the kingdom of God had at last been happily brought again to light.

The title of a sermon of Luther's printed in 1525 expresses. this idea as follows: "A Sermon on the Kingdom of Christ, which consists in the Forgiveness of Sins," etc. The words of Christ to the man sick of the palsy (Mat. ix. 2) form the subject: "Be of good heart, son, thy sins are forgiven thee." "These words," the preacher says, "indicate and sum up shortly what the Kingdom of Christ is." Since the Kingdom of Christ raust be defined in relation to the question; "How must we behave with regard to God?" it cannot and must "not be regarded otherwise" than according to these words: "Thy sins are forgiven thee"; for "this is the chief thing, viz. that which can quiet the conscience." "Whence it follows that the Kingdom of Christ is so constituted that it contains nothing but comfort and forgiveness of sing." The chief fault of our reason is its "inclination, everywhere manifest, to forsake this faith and knowledge and to fall back upon works."

In Holy Scripture the object of the Kingdom of Christ is differently given. There it culminates in the glory of God. God's glorification is the real aim of Christ's coming, and must also be the supreme object of every believer. This does not in the least tally with that trumped-up holiness-by-works which Luther saw in Catholicism. This far higher, general, Catholic thought of God's glory pervades the first petitions of the prayer taught by our Saviour Himself in the Our Father: "Hallowed be Thy Name," etc., only in the fifth petition do we hear of the forgiveness of sins for which, indeed, every human creature must implore. In the Our Father we acknowledge first of all our obligation to serve God with all our powers and strive to comply with our duty of glorifying His name. Hence Catholic religious instructions have never commenced with "the simple forgiveness of sin," with attempts to cloak it and to induce a fancied security in the sinner; their purpose has ever been to show that man is created to serve God and to honour Him, and that he can best do so by imitation and love of Christ.

⁴ "Werke," Weira, ed., 24, p. 355; cp. Erl. ed., 14³, pp. 191, 195, 195 f., 205, 211 f.

This high object, the only one worthy of man and his spiritual powers, leads us to consider the doctrine of good works.

4. Good Works in Theory and Practice

Man is naturally disposed to believe that, built as he is, he must take his share in working out his salvation, if he be in sin, by preparing himself with God's help to enter the state of grace and then by seeking to retain it by means of good works.

The Church before Luther had taught, as she still does, and that on the strength of Holy Writ, that such cooperation on man's part, under God's assistance, is quite essential. Though the attaining to and the perseverance in the Divine sonship is chiefly the work of God, yet it is also man's, carried out with the aid of grace. She assured the faithful, that, according to the order graciously established by God and warranted by Scripture, all good works have their value for temporal and eternal reward. She sought indeed to kindle religious fervour by pointing to the promises held out, yet she had no wish to see man stop short at the thought of his reward, but rather expected him to rise to a more perfect love. Generosity, so she taught, was in no way impaired by the prospect of reward, on the contrary such hopes served as stepping-stones to facilitate the ascent.1

17.-2 0

On the teaching of antiquity see Bellumian, "Do justifications," 5, n. 10 seq.

Luther, owing to his implacable, personal aversion to any good works or human co-operation, laid violent hands on this so reasonable scheme of salvation.

Nature and Origin of the New Doctrine of Works.

Luther demanded that no importance should be set on co-operation by means of works in the business of Justification, because salvation was to be looked for from on high with simple faith and blind confidence. After reconciliation, too, man must not vainly fancy that he is capable of deserving anything by good works even by the greatest penances, sacrifices or deeds of love, but the doing of good must be allowed to follow simply as the effect of the Spirit of Christ now received, in those feelings towards God which Christ produces in us and in that love of our neighbour which is indispensable to human society.

Further light may be thrown on this standpoint of Luther's by some traits from his inward history and writings.

Here we cannot fail to notice echoes of his transition period, of his conflict with his brother-monks and those pious folk who were intent on good works and the heaping up of merits; of his subsequent remissness in his vocation and in the performance of his duties as a monk; finally of his later prejudice, largely a result of his polemies, against so many of the Church's public and private practices, of penance, of devotion and of the love of God. He closed his eyes to the fact, that he could have found no more effectual means of increasing amongst his followers the growing contempt for moral effort, neglect of good works and the gradual decline in religious feeling.

His estrangement from what he was pleased to call "holmess-by-works" always remained Luther's principal, ruling idea, just as it had been the starting-point of his change of mind in his monastic days.1

His chief discovery, vis. the doctrine of Justification, he was fond of parading as an attack upon works. It is only necessary to observe how persistently, how eagerly and instinctively he seizes the smallest pretext to launch in his sermons and writings a torrest of abuse on the Catholic works. It is as though some unseen hand were ever ready to open the since-gates, that, whether relevant or not to ⁸ See vol. i., p. 118 ff.

the matter on hand, his anger might pour forth against fasting, and the ancient works of penance, against "cowis and tonsures," against the regitation of the Office in choic. rules, collections, pilgrimages and Jubilees, against taking the discipline, yows, veneration of the Saints and so many other religious practices.1 In his habitual slanders on works, found on his lips from the beginning to within a few weeks of his death, we can hardly fail to see the real link which binds together his whole activity. As against the Popish doctrine of works he is never weary of pointing out that his own doctrine of works is based on Christ; "it allows God to be our Lord God and gives Him the glory," a thought that pleased him all the more because it concealed the error under a mantle of piety; this deceptive idea already casts its shadow over the very first letter in his correspondence which touches on the new doctrine.3

Johann Eck could well answer: " Luther is doing us an injustice when he declares that we by our works exclude Christ as Mediator. . . . On the contrary, we teach, that, without Christ, works are nothing. . . . Therefore let him keep his bes to himself; the works that are done without faith, he may indeed talk of as he likes, but, as for ours, they proceed from the bottom rock of faith and are performed with the aid of Divine grace."4

Equally deceptive was the idea, so alluring in itself, that

Table-Talk

Ludderus and per opera sua Christian excludant mediatorem, etc.

Cp e.g., "Werke," Weim ed., 6, p. 683 f.; 10-2, p. 126; Ed. ed., p. 54; 28, p. 164, 63 p. 286. Vol. 155, p. 282, he speaks of the lossy world," and, pointing out that Christ had become the fulfilled of the Law, mays: "They [the Paperta] houst of their while. " -Thu is for him the real object of attack; he is determined to inveigh against the " unus furar, welle per opera coram Dra agere," and says of the Catholica -"opera quibus ergs homines istendum est, afternis Dec." "Worke," Wern ed., 10, 2, p. 187; "Opp. lat. vac.," 6, p. 396.

"My struggle has been first of all against all trust in works, on which the world insuits and struts." "Worke," Bet. ed., 58, p. 382.

^{*} To George Speaken, the Memourgen Augustician, April B 4516, "Briefwechsel," I, p. 29: against the "featativ presumption is in modius et sus principus que tuati el bone case omarbus virilius atuatent. synommies matricion Des, quer un Curinto est nobre efficiencime et grana donata, querrunt en ar spesa tamáin operars brus, donic hidrant fiduciom stance coran Des, rejuts virtuibus et meritis ornate, quod est impunible fien. Cp. Weim. ed., 1, p. 347; "Opp. lat. var.," 1 p. 236, a hero ha spenta against the "affectus proprier matitiss" and declares that the sense of good works performed led men to fall. P. 347 = 237 the with to have remained always pure was simply foolish, etc.

"Opers." Para II, Ingelstadia, 1531, p. 95; "Calumicatur

Luther's doctrine of works bore the stamp of true freedom, via. the freedom of the Gospel. Here, again, we can only see a new expression of his profound alienation from works and from the sacrifice entailed by self-conquest. He is desirous, so he says, of housing on the shield the freedom of the man who is guided solely by God's Spirit. But will this not serve as an excuse for weakness? Here we seem to find an after-effect of that late-mediaval pseudo-mysticism which had once been a danger to him, which went so far as to demand of the righteous complete indifference to works, and, that, in language apparently most affecting and sublime.

These two thoughts, that Christ would thus be restored to His place of honour and man secure evangelical freedom, were a great temptation to many hearers of Luther's call to leave the Catholic Church. In all great intellectual revolutions there are always at work certain impelling ideas, either true ones which rightly prove attractive, or false ones which yet assume the appearance of truth and thus move people's minds. Without the intervention of the two thoughts just referred to, the spread of the religious movement in the 16th century is not fully to be explained.

How many of the apostles and followers of the new preaching were really moved by these two thoughts must even then have been difficult to determine. Noble and privileged souls may not have been wanting amongst them. The masses, however, introduced so earthly an element into these better and pious ideals that the ideals only remained as a pretext, a very effective pretext indeed, to allege for their own pacification and in extenuation of their other aims. Great watchwords, once put forward, often serve as a useful cloak for other things. In this respect the demand for the freedom of the Gospel proved very popular. The age clamoured to be set free from bonds which were proving existence, for instance, to mention but one point, from exorbitant ecclesiastical dues and spiritual penalties. Hence evangelical freedom was readily accepted as synonymous with deliverance, and, in time, ceased to be "evangelical" at all.

That Luther's doctrine of works and of the freedom bestowed by Christ the fulfiller of the Law, embodied a great moral danger, is now recognised even by Protestants.

"How terribly dangerous," a Protestaat Church-historian mays, ' se that ' To be for ever and ever secure of life in Christ ' in the sense in which Lather understands it ! We Protestants ere merely toning it down when we find in it simply the conaccountees of being supported by God; to Luther it is much more . . . it is a feeling of spiritual mastery." The mithor quotes as descriptive of Luther's attitude the characteratic watchword from his writing " Von der Freyheyt eynes Christen Menschen " : "The Christian is so far exalted above everything by faith that he becomes spiritually lord over all, for there is nothing that can endanger his anavation." To these we may append Luther's spoken words; "This is Christian freedom . . . to have no need of any work in order to attain to piety and salvation"; a Christian may say: I possess " such a Savious that I need have no feer of death, and em certain of life for ever and ever; I can snap my fingers at the devil and his boil, and am ne longer called upon to tremble before the wrath of God."1 The same writer also points out, that, according to Luther, thus happy believer " remains for all this inwardly ('intrinsect') a sinner and is righteous only outwardly ("extransecs")." From such teaching as this respect for works was bound to suffer: the question of "religion and morality," whether from the point of view of religion in the process of salvation or from the point of view of morals in social action, could not be astisfactorily solved thereby. "In both cases morality comes short. Theologically no sufficient bulwark is erected against misinterpretation." "Luther had trouble enough, and through his own fault, in stemming the incroschments of immorality, "

More strongly, and with the frankness usual in the polemics of his day. Williamld Pirkheimer, Luther's former friend, voices the same thought when he speaks of the "not evangelical, but rather deviled freedom" which, owing to the preaching of the new "evangelical truth," had made itself so "shockingly" felt amongst so many speatates, both male and female, and had induced him, after long hesitation, to betake himself back to the Catholic fold.

Before quoting the opinion of other entires of the preaching against works in his own time, we may give Luther the chance to describe the extent of his opposition to the olden doctrine.

He is determined, as he says as early as 1515, "to root out utterly the stupid, fieskly affectation that trusts in such works." "Many graces and ments," so he taught even then, "lend man from God, we are so ready to rely on good works, more than an

W Köhler, "Demfiss Luther," p. 42, referring to Luther's Works, Erl. ed., 32, p. 261.

From Kilian Leib, "Verantwortung des Klosterstaarles," fol. 179'.
Co. Döllinger, "Raferstation," 1. p. 5, 33 : 2nd ad. p. 597

Cp. Döllinger, "Referenation," 1, p. 5, 33; 2nd ed., p. 587.
"Werke," Weim, ed., 1, p. 349; "Opp. let. var.," 1, p. 239.

Ond Hamself ", yet we should rather, " in also due unbedrom, pay horself to God's merry from the bottom of our bract." The mult tude of our seas must not arouse draper, what should make us detructful is any ethying after good works. ; we " ought rather to take roluge in the merry of God". The error of good works is our ruin, for it induces in us. " a feeling of self-rightcourness." The latter words partray his own psychological state at that time. It was these lab ideas that hid to his quarrel with the Observantines amongst his brethern and with the as called. "Lattle basis." Here also we have an echo from the world of thoughts already described as the real exacting point of his unit development.

During this crucial period of his mental growth he preached in 1515 on the glad takings of the Gospel, it was " glad," because it tought us " that the low had already been fulfilled by Christ, no that it was no larger necessary for us to fulfill it, but only, by faith, to hang it about the Man who had fulfilled it and become conformed to Him, because Christ is our Right counsess, Molinean and Redemption."

Later he curren to speak stall more strongly. He judy admitted it was natural to all men, himself included, to turn to good works in trouble of conservacy; it was beyong reason not to rest of them." yet, according to him, in adacting our congruence we must pay us heed either to un or to weeks, but put our whole trust in the righteousness of Chest; we must, to quote him literally, " set up grace and forgiveness, not only against sun, but more against good works. * It is true that he protests that he has no intention to exclude works (other statements of liss in favour of good works will be queted in due times, yet he above them to a level which fails to explain why thrist and the Apostes an earnest y recommended them and promised an eternal reward for their performance. Larber moures us that good works form "worldly righteomeren" ; that love of our neighbour is imported for the welfare of monety and because we live together, yet he structiontly condenses up a . Absencial delanon, "the view " that works are of any value to righteousness in the eight of God. *

Who of his contemporaries could deny that Luther presched a wonderfully simple and easy road to "life evertasting"? If this and the "forgoverous of are " were to cost no more than he insists upon elsewhere, vir." that you hear the Word and believe it when you have heard it; if you because it, then you have it without any trouble expense, only or passe, thus does the Compel of Christ and the Christ an teaching do everything with a few short words, for it is God's own Word."

Verify of notice in connection with his ideas of evengeheal freedom (see above, p. 453, and vol. u., p. 27 fl.; in the significant

```
<sup>3</sup> Thid., p. 348=238.

9 Thid., p. 347=238.
```

 [&]quot;Werke," Wenn. et., 1, p. 106.
 "Werke," Erl. ed., 14', p. 212 f

^{*} Ibid., p. 213. * Ibid., p. 221.

² Ibid., 6², p. 157, Hauspostille. Cp. above, p. 438, n. 9.

use he makes of the term applied in the New Testament to all Christians, via members of a "royal precthood," which Luther takes as meaning that all believers have a certain supremacy ever sin.

As every Christian, so he teaches, by virtue of the universal preschood possesses authority to "proclaim the Gospel," as everyone, "man, woman or maid," is qualified to "teach" who " knows how to and scable," so the " Spirit of Christ encourages " all without exception and makes of each one "a great Lord and King of all." But, "where works are preached, there the right of primogeniture is taken from us," and this privilege of "royal and priestly dignity disappears completely." Sometimes the devil tries to force us to san, for "he is a servant and has his own way. If he forces me to sin then I run to Christ and invoke His help; then he is ashamed. The more he does, the greater his shame. Thus this power is omerpotent, "Thou hast set all things under his feet ' [Pa. viu. 8], we are told. 'We shall judge the angele, says St. Paul [1 Cor. vi. 3]. That is our right of primogeniture which we must excribe, not to ourselves, but to Christ. But when Christ has eleaned you, then you do what in good, not for yourself (by gaining ment), but for others." - Such a doctrine he could truly may the Papiets failed to understand. But he adds further: They cannot even pray; " with their prayers they merely mock God,"1

If all the faithful are, as the new Evangel teaches, by virtue of their right of primogeniture great Lords and Kings, then that fear of God's chastisements is no longer justified which the accient Church had always put forward as one of the motives for performing good works and leading a moral life. On the contrary, we are not to open our hearts too readily to such fear. Luther's injunctions concerning fear of the Judge go to form a further chapter in the psychological and historical criticism of his doctrine of works. Here we see plainly his instinctive aversion to the views and practice of the olden Church.

The Cathole doctrine of fear had been expressed with wonderful simplicity in the "limitation of Christ," already widely read in the years previous to the Reformation: "It is well, my son, that so long as love avails not to restrain thee, fear of eternal punishment should at least affright thee from evil. Whoever disregards fear will not long be able to persevers in good."—"Consider how those mayont answer for thyself before the stern judge": "Now thy labour is still fruitful, now thy contrition still clearnes and makes entorisction." "At the day of judgment the man who has mortified his first here below will rejoice more then he who has reclaiged it in furney "- The "Imitation" deares, however, that fear should be allied with confidence and love. " Look on Me," it makes Christ may, " lot not thy heart be troubled our airead. Believe in Me and trust in My morely. Where thou thinkent thou art for from Ma, I am often closest to them." "If thou but trust in the Lord," it says again, "strong h will be given then from above." . Thou hast no need to lear the devil if thou art armed with the grow of Christ." Nor do we must in this book with any trace of that from four which Luther repreeaning as prevalent is the monastence, on the contrary it treets no into on love. "In the clouter no one can persevery sashess ha be ready for the love of God to humbin homeelf from the buttors. of his beert."

^{2 &}quot;Werke," Weim, ed., 15, p. 432, as the notes taken of a sermon of 1624.

In order to supply a sastable background for his new doctrine, Luther made out Catholic antiquity to have featered both in theory and in practice a graven fear, of which in reality it know nothing at all. By executing the elements of trust and love, he reduced Catholic life to the morest state of fear, as though the had actually been the sphere to which it moved, he charges it with having cultivated that service four which would at once commit an were there no penalty attached; he also finds to thonastic life an element of excitement and confusion which, as Our readon already know, was really posuhar to he own personal temperament at one time.

For more characteristic than such exhanging to his own attitude to that fear of God's judgments which a just and independable.

Not as though, generally, he did not recommend and present the "fear of God." This, however, falls beads the mark once much a feur may exist without any adverting to the pureshrousts of the judge, and, as Lather himself puts it, not altogether incorrectly, to more " an awe that holds God in honour and which to mways expected of the Christian, just as a good child should fone his father "1. This is the "timer recornitions," to use the earlier theningical term. But to the actual fear of the Ihvons judgments as an expostory and moving motive, Listher gives no piace whatever, neither in the justification of the samer, accing that he makes faith the one condition for its attainment, or subsequent to justification and in the state of grace, because there all that obtains a confidence in the covering over of six by grace, while the state of grace, in his opinion, of its own nature necessarily works what is good. The Law and its threats, is, in his opinion, useful " for revealing ain " in order that, knowing thus, "grace may be sought and obtained"; "thus the Law works fear and wroth, whereas grace works hore and morey."1

Four, in reality, is contemptable, it "is there because on prevails," hence st is not found in the pious, not even in Old-Testament times. " Let us," he cries, " cast at our feet ad free-will. . . . Nature and free-will cannot stand before God, for they fear last He should fall upon them with Hm club. . . Where the Holy Spirit does not whisper to the heart the Evangelical promises, man looks upon God as a devil, executioner, task master and judge. . . . To the devil with such holizons! "I The above is no mere momentary outburst, it is a theological system and the expression of his deep psychological prejudice. We are carried back to his monastic days and to the theory which fear led him to invent to allay his own personal agitation, but to which he could hold fast only by dust of doing violence to himself.

⁴ "Werke," Erl, ed., 18⁴, p. 349.

Werke," Ween, ed., 1, p. 369, Thoua 16.
 Cp. "Opp. Int. exeg.," 1, p. 360; 10, p. 159; 11, p. 121.

When he came to see, that, to preserve the people from moral degradation, fear of the Judgments of God had to be preached, he urged that it should be emphasized and declared it quite essential. This he did particularly in his instructions for the Vautation of the Saxon Electorate, which accordingly contain what is practically a repudiation of his teaching. The reasonable and wholesome fear of the judge, which he would have preached to the "aimple people" for the moving of their hearts, ir spite of all his protesta has surely a right and claim to work on the minds not merely of the "aimple" but even of the educated, and accordingly to be urged even by the theologians.

Luther's attitude here was as ambiguous as elsewhere, for instance, in the case of his whole doctrine of grace and justification, so less than in its premises, vis. unfreedom, concupiscence and original sin. Everywhere we meet with contradictions, which make it almost impossible to furnish any connected description of his doctrinal system.

Augustine as the Authority for the New Doctrine of Works.

We have an example of Luther's want of theological acumen in his appeal to Augustine in support of his doctrine of works.

In order to understand this we must recollect that, from the beginning, Luther had described his new theology as simply that of Augustine the great Father of the Church. Of Augustine's—of whom he said in 1516 that he had not felt the slightest leaning towards him until he had "tumbled on" his writings—he had merely read in 1509 a small number of works, and he became acquainted with what were for him the more important of this Father's writings only after he had already largely deviated from the Church's ^{*} Werke," Werm, ed., 16, p. 397; Erl. ed., 36, p. 6 f.

* To Spalatin, Oct. 16, 1516, "Briefwechsel," I, p. 64: "qui (Augustinus) apud me, antequam in libros cius mediasem, ne tantillum quedem favoris Aabust." Other Augustinuans made more account of this Saint, popularly regarded as their founder.

doctrine. Even later, his knowledge of Augustine was scanty. He was, however, as a monk, fond of identifying his own new doctrine of grace with Augustine's: he tried to enlist the help of his colleague. Amsdorf, by a present of St. Augustine's works; in this he was completely successful. On May 18, 1517, he wrote to Lang on the state of things at Wittenberg, the triumphant words already quoted: "Our theology and St. Augustine are making happy progress with God's help and are now paramount at the University," etc.4 From that time forward he was fond of saying, that Augustine was opposed "to Gabriel Biel, Thomas of Aquin and the whole growd of Sententiaries, and would hold the field against them because he was grounded on the pure Cospel, particularly on the testimony of Paul."5 To what extent he really in his heart believed this of Augustine must remain a moot question.

"Luther," says Julius Köstlin, one of the best-known authorities on Luther's theology, "could, indeed, appeal to St. Augustine in support of the thesis that man becomes righteous and is saved purely by God's gracious decree and the working of His Grace and not by any natural powers and achievements [which is the Catholic doctrine], but not for the further theory that man is regarded by God as just purely by virtue of faith. . . nor that the Christian thus justified can never perform anything meritorious in God's sight but is saved merely by the pardoning grace of God which must ever anew be laid hold of by faith." [i.e. the specifically Lutheran theses on faith and works]. The same author adds: "Only gradually did the fundamental difference between the Augustinian view, his own and that of Paul become entirely clear to Luther."

When this happened it is hard to say; at any rate, his strictures on Augustine and the Fathers in his lectures of 1527 on the 1st Epistle of St. John, and in his later Table-Talk prove, that, as time went on he had given up all idea of

* Ibid., p. 127.

* "Stud. and Krit.," 1878, p. 698, Kostha Kawerau, I, p. 134.

* "Briefwechsel, 'I, p. 106: "Theologia nodra et S. Augustanus prospers procedum," etc.

* Koscha Kawerau, 1, p. 137; here it is first stated. "Lather's theology was regarded by him and his friends as samply that of the great Father Augustine,"

4 Hild , p. 136.

⁶ Cp. Köstlin-Kawerau, 1, pp. 75, 100 f.

finding in these authorities any confirmation of his doctrme on faith alone and works.1

However his convictions may have stood, he certainly, in his enrius westings, charned Augustine in support of his doctrine of the absence of free-will, particularly on account of a passage in the work " Contra Julianem," which Lither repeats and applied under various forms." There can, of course, he no question of fit. Augustine a having actually been a partman, whether here or elsewhere, of the Lutherns doctrine of the "enslaved will " These and other passages from 5t. Augustine which Lather quotes in proof of the unfreedom of the will ready tell against him , he either tears them from their evetext or che he laimfies their meaning. * He is equally unlair when, in his Commentary. on Romana and frequently chowhere, he appends to the Ductor of the Charele is defence of his opinion, that, after imprints, sin really atili periods in man, his sum in last dietrine of conexpensione in general." where he even faits to quote his texts currectly. He after the sense of Augustine's words with regard to the liveping of Gold's romasandments, the difference between venual and mortal ma, and the virtues of the just * Denific, after patiently tracing Lither a patriotic encursions, angely exclaims:

"He treats Augustine as he does Holy Scripture...!

Descring of notice, because it explains both his repeated quotacions from Augustice and his advance; of the notice of feat, is a lengthy admonition of 1831 couched in the form of a letter on the detence of the new decrine of faith alone and of worse. The letter was written by Melanchth in to Johann Brens, but it had the entire approval of Lather, who even approval a few words to it. While clearly throwing overheard Augustine, it is nevertheless arxious to petals him.

The effect decreased the expectance alleged by Berna, the stiffment all products of the missing terms in Scalins, against Lative a doctrine of Just floation, particularly as formulated in the August sery Confession, and against Melanchthon's appeal therest to be August in . Breat urged that scale effort or man's part certainly intercened in the work of parties. In the resty Augustine a precised y gives up. Beens a told that he is wrong its charging to August new forcey ("Acres in Augustine strongentions") which puts our right-consists in the fulfilment of the Law. "Avert your eyes from such a regeneration of man and from the Law and both only to the produces and to Christ. Augustine is not in agreement with the discreme of Paul read of Lather 1, though he comes neares to it than do the School-

Op. Dülinger, "Die Reformation," 3, p. 364.

August , "Contra Jul.," 1, 2, c. 8, n. 21. Cp. Denific-Wess, 12, pp. 486 ff., 511, 512, 511.

Thus Denific-Wess, shid., p. 808. 4 Hol., pp. 440 f., 467.

Ibid., p. 460. Ibid., p. 473. Ibid.

^{*} Melanchthon and Latter to Brens, and of May, 1621, "Latters Briefwiches!," S, p. 18.

mon. I quoto Augustino as in entire agreement 'proress desired. Although he does not millimently explain the righteentness of faith; this I do because of public opinion executiving hous." What he means is a fleace Augustine is universally head in such high outcom, and has been mateaced by m, for this reason I too quote him as though on this paint he agreed entirely with

Paul, which, as a matter of fact, is not the case.1

Melanchthon next deals more closely with the new idea of righteemerup. He hinte that, in the Augeburg documents, he had not been able to grank as he was now doing to Breen, although, so he persuades furnedly he was really saying the same then as new. He gives Breas what, compared with Lather's blust words as the end, to a very polished reschering of the Wittenberg. destrine. ' Dismiss the lancy of Augustion entirely from your mind," he concludes, " and then you will rendry understand the reason (why only faith can pastify); I hope that then you will fird to our "Agongs," [of the Confession, some profit, thoughin it I was obliged to express trany threat with that tiredity Which can only be understood in struggles of conceince ('en cortomorbus sensorentument'). It is ensential to bring to the care of the propie the preaching of the Law and of penance, but the above true doctrine of the Gos, of spent not be lost eight of. -To retire with his holed theology into the investe obscurity of the "struggles of conscience" was an art that the pupil had learnt from his master.

Lather, unlike Melanchthon, was no adopt on the tight-expe ; in his protectipt he biuntly districted the Low pengines and all works so for an they are intended to asset in easytchestion as Brons like the Imposts thought , his cry m "Christ mone". Not even in " leve or the gifts that follow from it," domeour solvation lie; to the work nothing within ourselves plays any part, therefore "away with all reference to the Law and to works," away too, with the thought of "Christ as Kewnedor!" " In the stead of every 'qualitie' in myself, whether termed faith or leve, I mencily not Jesus Christ and say : This is my righteriumous, this to cry "gradiene" and my "formalis ensisted," as they call it." Thus only had he everything in himself, thus only did Christ become the "way, the truth and the life ' to him, without "effecting this is me from without, in me, not, however, through me, He Himself must remain, live and socak." Of Augments Eather indeed says nothing in this passage, but he sould not have expressed more strongly the purely mechanical consequent of purtification, nor have rejected more emphatically every human work, even man a co-operation under grace.

With the decision Brees in his in tere to Lather and Melanchthen declared himself entacted, lineway with the matrixtion received, " which was worthy of a place in the canon of Scripture."

1 Thus Wrampelmover adder of Cordatus's "Tagebuch," on the copy of the letter in Cordatus, p. 343.

For the course pursued by Meinnrhthan when Jonuing up the portion of the Confession in question, see vol. in., p. 329 f.

It is unfortunate, however, that Conrad Cordatus one of Lether a favourite pupils, when consigning to his Notes the joint declarations of Luther and Melanchthon, should have registered a protest ageignt "Plubp's innovations." quarrel with Philip Melanchthon on the doctrine of Justification was one of the many phases of the dissensions called forth in the Protestant camp by the "article on which the Church stands or falls."1 Against any citation of St. Augustine the Litheran theologisms. and preachers in Pomerania protested during the negotiations for the formula of Concord. By thus falsely asleging this Father, they and in their dichration at the Synod of Stettin in 1677, a formulable weapon was placed in the hards of their Catholic opponents of which they had not failed to avail themselves against the Protestante, they were also assuming the corporationally for a public he. "Augustine's book "De spendu et lattern" teaches concerning Justification what the Papiets teach to-day." In the fellowing year they decisred against the form of the "first Conferms Augustana,' as published at Wittenberg in 1631 by Luther and our other fathers," again on the ground that " there Augustine a "commences" in alleged, " In Mechhadung the strictures of the Synode of Fonwrania were accepted as perfectly warranted. David Chytrinus, Professor at Routock and once a member of Melapchthon a household, stated about that time, that Erhard Schnepf, the Wartemberg theologian, who was of the same way of thinking as Johann Brons, had declared in 1844, i e. during Luther's lifetime, in a public discourse at Tubingen, that in the whole of Augustine there was not a syllable concertaing the rightcouncers of Christ being (imputed to us by faith. When Chytenus adds that Augustine "was and upwith the Papaste," it is very likely that he was countering the opposite use of this more word by Melarchthon in the passage mentioned above, the latter's spette to Brens had then already been printed.

The real teaching of St. Augustine is best seen in his anxiety that man should co-operate with all the power furnished by the assistance of God's grace, in the attainment of his anivation. The wholesome fear of God he reckons first, after the necessary condition of faith has been fulfilled. Of the acts of moral preparation (lear, hope, love, persance and good resolutions) for obtaining the grace of ^{2 &}quot;Tagebuch," od Weserpelmeyer, p. 386 : " Hasterus Philippus sile rum aus narefate". The differences between Ourdains and Molanchthen related to the dictrine of Justification under another aspect. On these changes are a botton Haweres, 2, p. 646 ff., on the want of unity on Justification generally amongst Luther's pupils, one Dellinger, "Die Ref.," 3, pp. 372-591.

Dollinger, los. sal., p. 367 f.

* Ibid., p. 370.

Justification from God, he regards fear as the element, without which a man "never, or hardly over," reaches God! To show the necessity of works and a good intention he appeals to texts in the Epistle of St. James rejected by Luther, where we read: "You see that by works a man is justified and not by faith on y" (n. 24). Here he goes so far as to suggest that James probably spoke so explicitly of works because the passages on faith in Paul's Epistles had been misunderstood by some."

"We say," so he teaches in opposition to Luther concerning the destruction of no. In man by haptism, "that haptism brings the resistance of all aims, and not increay errors them, but actually sense was their ("suferre crimina non ruders"), the roots of aid do not remain in the corrupt flesh, so that the aim have not to grow again and be again cut off like the hair of our heads."

The rightenomess which is becowed on the sunser is, in his view, no imputed righteomores of Climit but a personal righteomness actually residing in man. Hence he explains that the " Justice of God," reserved to in Hom. in 21 f., is not that whereby God in just, but that with which He provides the impious man when justifying him; in the same way the "faith of Christ" mentioned there is "not a faith by which Christ believes, but the faith that is is us." "Hoth are ours, but they are ascribed to God and Christ because bestowed on us by the Divine favour "5 The rightenuesees bestowed on us is "that which Adam lost by sin "; Adam's righteomeres was a quality inherent in him, not the imputed agisteousness of Christ. 4. It is also the same grace which is infused into adults in Justification and which children receive in baptism. By sanctifying grace the soul is inwaedly ennobled, "for when nature's Creator justifies it by grace, it ceases to be an object of horror and becomes a thing of beauty."? The Holy Chest duells in us and "God gives us therewith no loss a gift than Henself " Thus " as the soul is the life of the body, so God is the life of the soul."

Our state of grace may, however, be dammed, and that not only by back of faith; for it has its enen as in imperfections and sain.

Though our rightermieses is a true one, yet in this blo the forg vertise of soil plays a go ster part than the perfection of virtue.   If our will turns against God, we reparate ourselves

⁴ "De catechizanda rodiboa," c. 5.

Lib. 63, quest., q. 76; "Enerr. 2 in pealm. 31," a. 3; "De fide et openbus," c. 14, n. 2).

De spiritu et littera," e 9
De percato et mento. 1 9.
Do Trin.tate," 15, 8, 14.

" De fide et symbolo, e 9.

In I sale: NN serm 2, n. 3.

10.5 De rivatate Des, 19, 27.

from Rim, and the light which calightened us during His presence at once changes rate durkness."1 In order to prevent any such danger on the part of the will, Augustine frequently reminds his renders of such exhertations of our Saviour, as: "If thou will enter into life, keep the commandments." "He that both my commandments and keepeth them, he at is that joyeth me."

Man is also spurred to be faithful, so he says, by the merit of good works. "God Husself has become our debtor," so he said when preaching to the assembled faithful; "not as though He had received something from us, but because He has promised what He pleased. To a man we speak differently and say . You are my debter because I have given to you. To God we say, on the centrary: Thou art my debter became Thou hast made me promises, . . . in this sense therefore we may large on God our demands and may: Give what Thou hast promised, for we have done what Thou didet command "a

To recommend the practice of good works out of love of God and seal for his honour, and to heap up most for heaven, is the purpose of long and eloquent portions of the literary legacy which Augustine left behind him. The whole of the book " De fele at eproble and long chapters of his " Backendies, " were written with this object. In the former work he introduces, for unitance, the Judgment according the our Saviour, and nave . . Those who are piaced on the left hand of Christ, according to this passage (Mat. xxv. 41), He will reproach not for not having believed in Him, but for not having performed good works. How could this he true if we were to attain to salvation without keeping the commandments or by facts alone (per adom Adem), which without works is dead ? Christ wished to impress on its that no one can promise himself eternal life by a dead faith, minus works. Hence He causes all the nations who have received the some spiritual (nod (of faith) to be separated out before Him, and courly it is such as have believed but have not performed good works who will say: When did we see Thee suffering this and that [and did not numster to Thee]? They had fanced that by a dead faith they could attain to overlasting life."*

The voice of the bishop of Hippo, supported by the whole Church whose doctrine was also his, was re-echoed by later ecclesiastical writers who made greedy use of his works: nor were the exhortations of the Fathers without result among the faithful. Later Fathers frequently discourse on the testimony of Holy Writ in favour of works just as Augustine had done; the following texts were frequently adduced. "God will render to every man according to his works "; " Not the hearers of the law are just before God,

¹ "Super Genes ad litt.," 8, 12.

Serme 158, c. 2. Semi-arry "In Prolin." LXXXIII and CIX, Defice et op., c. 10.

but the doers of the law shall be justified "; "The Son of Man will come and render to every man according to his works" (Rom. ii. 6, 18; Mat. xvi. 27).

Gregory the Great, who trained himself on Augustane's model, states, in a homily to his congregation: "Possibly we may say to ourselves: I believe, hence I shall be saved. This is only true when we prove our faith by our works." "Then are we true believers when we execute in work what we confess in our faith."

A faith proved by works was the sign manual of the Middle Ages. Nor did Luther and his preachers ever complain of the lack of works of piety in the days previous to the Reformation, although they thought it their duty to blame the spirit in which those works had been performed.

What, however, did Luther and his followers think of the moral consequences of the preaching directed against all merit of good works?

The New Doctrine of Works in Practice, as Judged by Lutheran Opinion in the 18th Century.

We have already listened to Luther's own complaints and those of many of his contemporaries concerning the parlous state of morals amongst the adherents of the new teaching, and the almost entire absence of any practical fruits of picty. under the amended Gospel.* Since the mainstay of the innovations was the doctrine of grace and works it is necessary to seek out more closely the connection between the new doctrine of works and the sad moral results of the revolt against the Church. Luther himself makes no odds about referring to these results and their real cause: "The surer we are of the freedom won by Christ, the more indolent do we become "; " because we teach that man attains to grace without any works whatever, we grow lazy"; he almost wishes "that the old teaching again came into its own." Only his shortsightedness and the psychological effect of his passionate temper prevented his foreseeing the mevitable consequences of his theory of the all-sufficiency of faith and of his reckless denunciation of the regard for commandments and works previously obtaining. How little his own frequent exhortations to lead a moral life and to perform works of Christian charity (see below, p. 479 ff.) could prevail against the fell charm of the doctrine of Evangelical freedom, remained hid from his eyes, until the extent of the moral corruption and the growing savagery of the people in certain regions began to frighten him and to cause him to long ardently for the end of the world and even to predict its imminence.

^{1 &}quot;Homil 29 in Eveng."

See particularly above, pp. 195-218.

Co. p. 212.

There was some truth in what he said, viz. that, as the world was constituted, if one preached faith (i.e. the justifying faith so much belauded by him) works went to the wall, and that, on the other hand, "faith" must needs perish wherever works were preached. The two were indeed self-exclusive, however much, in his recommendation of works, he might affirm the contrary.

This is not the place to point out anew the dangers inherent in Luther's doctrme of justification, for we have already seen the necessary result of one of its presuppositions, vis. the denial of free-will, and how right Erasmus was when he urged against Luther, that, on this assumption, all laws and commandments, even those of Scripture, were simply superfluous. A Protestant has aptly remarked, that, in the last instance, "the difference between good and evil becomes quite illusory", we might well ask. "How can we feel ourselves responsible towards God... if we do nothing and God works all in all?" Luther himself even goes so far as to make Scripture teach that "the will not only desires nothing good, but is even unaware of how much evil it does and of what good is." Since the imputed merits of Christ are, as a matter of fact, merely like a screen set up who keep to the true randle course and even pious Christians find it clifficult."—This was certainly quite true of the picty he taught.

* Thus M. Staub, "Willersfeethert... bet Luther," Zurich, 1894, p. 39, 2 ff. Op. the passage in Luther's book. De serve arbitrio," Weim, ed., 18, p. 697; "Opp. lat. var.," 7, p. 236; "Quid potest rebushus contra abresis arbitrium diet, quam sprim case minis at not mode non what bosses, and not send quidens, quantum facini male et quid set bosses." Thus he proven from the words of Christian the arose: "They know not what they do"." An est his obscurios in alle terbo I., . Hes clerisaments perbum Christi," etc.

Be eave in a frequently misquoted paragraph ("Werke," Erl. ed., 185, p. 352 f.) in so many words: "The world ever remains the same; either it exalts faith wrongly (as do the 'secure pseudo-Christians' on his sate whose 'faith is not rested aright, p. 351) or it wishes to be over holy but without faith like the Papeits]. If we discourse on faith and grace, then no one will perform good works; if we insist on works, then no one will have anything to do with faith; few indeed are those who keep to the true madde course and even prous Christians find it difficult."—This was certainly quite true of the picty he taught.

in front of the soul, many might naturally feel tempted to extenuate and excuse all that the sin which persists in man still does behind it.

To appreciate the peculiar nature of the danger it is necessary to take Luther's teaching, not by itself, but in conjunction with the mental atmosphere of the day. We must of course take it for granted that many of his followers refrained from putting into practice Luther's teaching in its entirety, for instance, his peculiar doctrine of the lack of free-will. Many well-disposed Lutherons whose good faith was above suspicion, doubtless remained more or less outside the influence of such ideas, were actuated by good religious motives and expressed them in Christian works. Assisted by the grace of God, which is at the disposal of all men of good-will, they, all unknowingly, were gaining merit in heaven. On the other hand, the ill-disposed, those who sought the enjoyments of life and of such there were thousands-found a sanction in the Wittenberg doctrine for neglecting good works. In the case of many the "hoyful tidings ' could not under the circumstances of the age beexpected to produce any other result. We have only to think of what was going on all about; of the prevalent yearning after release from irksome bonds, of the unkindly feeling towards rulers, both ecclesiastical and secular; of the seething discontent among the peasants on account of their oppression and toilsome duties; of the spirit of independence so vigorous in the terms; of the boundless ambition of the mighty, of the influence, sometimes accound, sometimes immoral, of Humanism, and of the worldliness and degradation of so many of the elergy and monks, to be able to understand how momentous was the effect of Luther's doctrine of justification and his preaching concerning works.

We know on the one hand from many examples with what sest the newly-won promoters of Lutheranism-for the most part former ministers of the Church who had discarded their colling, concentrated their attacks on the practice of good works, and, on the other, how the betterdisposed followers of the new doctrine admitted the danger to works accruing from Luther's views and even their actually evil consequences.

The declaration of the preachers against works was partly intended to allence their own scruples. At any rate it was the aparchest method of obtaining a numerous following. preschers were obliged to deal in some way with the objection constituted by the existence of far greater religious seas in the niden Church than amongst the new benevers; they so well it by denouncing seal for " outward works." They were also frequently obliged to extenuate their even lamity of morals, and this they did in the most convenient fashion by branding moral strictness as pharmaicae holiness-by-works.

Thus it came about that some, even of the more cautious and moderate Lastherana, for metance Urban Rhegus, complained that the preachers were contring themselves to the denunciation of works and to proclaiming the power of faith alone, as though the great gift of the new religious system morely spols release from everything displeasing to the flesh; there they came very near metifying the constant assertion to this effect of the defenders of Cathelician, indeed the Cathelian' must effective Weapon.

Khomus, who died in 1841, as General Superintendent of Lineburg, summed up his experiences of the effect on the second of Lether's doctrine of Evergelical freedom, is the sermons ha delivered at Hall in the Tyrol: "The ruce, carnal people here think that the Law has been abeliahed and that we are released from it, so that we can do as we please , hence, quite sharedensly and to the thegrace of the Evangel, they say . To steal and to commit adultary at no longer sinful, for the Law is no more of any account. A.s., what cross blindness has falses upon this people, that they think the Son of God came into the world and suffered so much on account of sm in order that we might lead a chameful, dissolute and best al life."*

A man of no great firmness of character, he had previously heen episcopal vicar at Constanus, and could speak from experience of the condition of things amongst the preschers of both Southern and Northern Germany.

He accused them of being responsible for the disastrous consequences, but forgot to seek the real cause in the doctrine steelf. According to him not only did no two preachers agree in their preaching, an that the people complained they did not know which religion to fo low, but too many were in the habit of speak ing, " as though it were provide without doing pensace and welfout any contrition or corrow for an to believe Christ a Gospal and rest accure in the professed forg vences. * They gave vent to atterances such as these. "Our works are no good and stank in God's nostrile. He does not want them. They only make hypocrites. Faith alone does all. If only you believe, you will become pioue and be saved."

¹ U. Rhegu Dectsohe Bucher und Schriften," 2, Nurnberg, 1563,

p 234 Indanger ibid., p. 59.

^{} U. R. segras, Wie man fürsichtiglich reden soll," ed. A. Uckeley, Laprig, 1908, according to the 1530 Cerman edition ( Quellennaturation mar timels, doe frozent. Of in Lebelry a summary, p. 7, ³ Urban Rhegius, "Eine Summe christl. Lehre." Augsburg, 1527. fol 5, Dollinger, "Ref." 3, p. 58.

In 1835 he had recourse to the pan in order to impress on the preschers " How to speak with enution," as the title of his work guns. In this tenet, published in German and Latin, he attempts to show from a number of unstances "how the preschers run off the track on one aids or the other," and how many of them "sperely destroy and fail to build." Assions to drive home Luther's deciring of good works, in the chapter devoted to this authors. I he mantions are different ways in which good works were profitable, which the presches were not to forget. In all ear, however, the real advantage and accounty of good works in not established on its true foundation. The curious tract was an from attern and enlargement of a work published in 1520 under the title : " Anwewing wie und was wif Ernet von Gots Gnaden Piertaig in Brainiwick and Louneburg unsern Furntenthumbs Harbern und Predigern au predigen befohlen."* The secular rulers were often of liged as in this instance, to intersum in order to saleguard the new faith from preachess who were either thoughtless, or too logical, or in some cases half crass.

The compounts current among Luther's francis about the bad effects of the doctrine of justification were even heard long after the turnsite of the earliest reaglous struggles were over.

For this reason we are not justified in making out the decline which followed in the train of the new system of faith to have been merely an epocide in the history of dividention and amply the more table after effect of the great upheaval in the intellectual It has been argued that fur-reaching and disturbing changes in public life are socially accompanied by an increase of tours, relaty among the masses, and also that the disorders dating from Cataosic turce bere fruit only when brought in contact with the new policion. Unfortunately in the present case we have to do with road tions which, as later witnesses show, permated even when truing it lifty had once more heen restored and when the fruits of the new piece about already have repend. "What is here disclosed, purity remarks Di limger, " was the coult of a cestam accordy firmly established, no more after-effect of further congitains, trat a true home preduce continuing to floamsh even when the threshold two Waich had once lineed higher bie and conprovisions with the elect Church had long been torn and rest meanier, and when the memory of the doctrines, imagery, pen teem and metatutions of that Church had either been compostely ferrorten by the people, or were known to them only through controverse references made in the pulpite and in the manuals of religious matruction."*

Antrew Hyperica, Professor at the University of Marburg and the best theological authority in Hesse. † 1864), in view of the low recigious and moral standards of the Profestanta which he had bed occasion to notice during his many journeys, declared that it was necessary, particularly in the pulpit, to be more responding the article of Japuillession by faith alone. Not indeed that he was unwilling to have this preached, yet he did not counder it advisable to continue to "decision to the masses with such victores on faith alone," as had bitherte been done. The state of the Church most urgently required that the propin, who already troubled themselves little enough about doing good, should be spurred on to good weeks and as far as possible, brought back to a facth productive of fruit. I Blowhere he describes with indignation the generally prevading indifference towards the poor , this annoyed has all the more, as he was well aware of the loving care displayed towards them by both clergy and lasty in the past."

Uckeley, ibid. I fold., p. 44.

^{*} Ibid., p. 9, reprinted by Ucheley
1 "Die Reformation," 2, p. vii. f.

In a document dealing with Luther's for rather Floriss's) doctrine of man a passivity in the work of conversion, the theningians of Learning and Wettenhorg, in 1870, attributed to it the provading corruption. "The manner" they said, "have been led into a wild, describts and godies his. . . There is hardly a epot to be found in the whole world where greater medway, honesty and virtue are not to be met with thee amongst those who listen daily to God's Word."*

Thirty years inter Po years Leyenr, the Wittenberg Professor and Supremisedent, who stood for the strictest form of Lathernais a declared. "The moral corruption to-day is so great everywhere that not only prous couls but even nature hereoil gives vent to aneasy grouns " ; as the cause of it all he mentions the delusion under which many mentions of the new Church laboured, via, of insering themselves excellent Christians so long in they bomited kindly of finish and represed Scripture passages concerning the use wakable merry of God Who received manus into His favour without any so operation on their part, even though meanwhile they led the most shameful life.4

"All these people have ever the faith in their mouths," wrote Wolfgarg Frant, the Wittenberg professor of theology, in an attromition to the Latherna preachess (1610), " they are ever prating of faith and of nothing but faith, and yet no one can adequately describe how brunful they are of vice and sin. ' For this the preschers were chiefly to blame, because they distred Justificats in by faith alone into the people sears without further explaining it; hence many of their hearws, who did not even know the Our Father, could discourse on fact himselfermedly than Ht. Paul ; they faceted that if only they protested new and then during their lifetano that they believed in Jesia Christ, their Delbuger, shall, 2, p. 216.

2 four, torn, 2 Bearl, 1570, p. 371; ep. p. 841. Delbuger, shall, 2, "Wahrbaltager Bericht" ste (referring to the Alterburg Collegue), 1802, Fol. D 2, Löllinger, "Reformation." 2, p 261 f * For generate Samurling von alten und neuen theid Socheti," 1750, p. 676 ff. Döllinger, 2, p. 565.

^{4 &}quot; Hypera Varus opuncula theol.," Lon. 2, Bank, 1500, p. 734.

colvation was assured; they thought that if a murdicut who deed after commutaing his crime had only turns to confirm Josus With his light he would at once near up to beaven !

Johannes Rivers, Rectar of Freeberg, and a personal friend of Lather a, declared the very year after Lether's death that his onpersonce had shown him that the Latherne presents know norther what they arould believe nor how they ought to use, and troublist Committee little about it; the possio might will be taken for Entrarours were they not perputatily boasting of their faith in Carot. He howard his times, distinguished as they were beyond all past ages by their immerality; corruption of mornit had indeed grown as had that ungedimen and Epicureanest had quite ourted Christianity ! Not long after, in another writing, he continued his description of the moral decay, and again and again points to the cours, vis. the false ideas of faith, low and works. "By far the greater number of people to-day take not the nightest passe to restrain the hous of the firsh they indulys as every hard of arperty, while at the same time boasting of faith and bragging of the Grupol people hear movedays that there is no other entidection for unthan the death of the Holosmer, they fancy they can an with impunity and give themselves up to lummy . . . How many are there who practice real paperer though making as brave a show of faith? . . . They may: 'Even should you be stained with every vice, only believe and you will be saved , you need not be around by the Law, for Christ has fulfilled it and done enough for mee 1". Buch worth [which Lather himself had med] give great aranda) to prous cooks, had mon astray into a proline his and are the cause of their conunuing to five hardened in vice and shame and unthout a thought of amendment; thus such them only serve to orcoarage the ungodly to vice and deprive them of every incensive to amond their lives."*

If the leaders of the spaceations could speak to such a way then yet stronger charges against the dectrine of Justiliantion and its effects may be expected from Lather a opponents.

Johann Haner of Numeribery, who there, in 1834, turned his back on the new faith, wrote a small beek on the interpretation of Scripture which is accounted among the best and esiment of the percent. The Prefere shows that it was the night of the immore, outcome of Luther's views on faith and grace which had him to revert to Catholicism. Without mentioning Luther a name he tells us that in his book he is going " to withstand all fairs, finishly exofidence," " all fewedom of the apart which leads to distruction ", the object of his attack in that fasts which in " a more presumptions laying class to grace, and that Evargel which opens the door to beenes of every kind," while " teling us to trust sclery in an aben rightenusions, via the rightenusions of Christ"; " these anti-Evangelicals, as they ought to be called, by their requesy and their earnal mind had turned topoy-turvy the teaching which led to true picty."

^{1 &}quot;Wolfg Francis Deputations in August, Confess, Artes, purterior," Elegat. 19, " De tionar operdicar ... in Pfeifer, "Comman ed ," p. 843 avg - Tibl organ, 2, p. 870.

* Lob Breton, De stone en mortalisan," p. 28. Delloger 2 p. 600.

^{*} Phina, pp. 30 arg., most | Opp., 7 (014, pp. 274, 206, 270, 072). Dollinger, 3, p. 461 ff.

To Wood the convert Hane, wrote a letter which was one of the course of he expulsion from Nuremberg by the preschess and the magnitudes. Here he end: "By the worthous degme of Justification by faith alone, which is their slips and emerge, they have not merely knowed all the bonds of distribute in the Chirch, but also san mored all penaren towards and and all unity and friendship among the brethess. hower since the enrisest because in the Church has there been seen so possenous and nozious a degme, the affect of which has been none other than to make the word of the Crum formbasis to us, and to comm brile charry towards the brethess and the sparit of rejentance towards God to wax cold."

From Protestant Auremberg at also was that Willibald Pirkhermer the patherian, as early as 152%, after his new return to the Church, wrote to a friend at Vienna, the architect Techerite, "I confess that in the beginning I was a good Lutheran, just like our departed Albert Truces J. For we housed that the Roman knowery and the requery of the monks and private would be arrended. But now we are that mattern have become so gouch worse, that, in evenperson with the Evengelical ecoundrels, those other scamps are quite pious." The Evangelicals with their "shamelus and enrical behaviour" unded nevertheless "not to be judged by their works, and pointed to their faith. But "when a man acts weekedly and eraminally he shows thereby that he is no honest man, however much he may beast of his faith, for without within faith in dead, just an world are dead without factle . . The works show pounty that there is notther faith nor truth there, no lear of God, or love of our amphibour. but a discarding of all honesty and clean living, art and learning . . . Almorroug has record, for these known have an abused it that no one will give ony longer."*

A few years before this, Otherse Lucinius, an Alescian theolegion, then one of the excit weighty erholars of Germany, who, save for his ing makes a precing family for Luther, retinated true to the Church, described the "rude Christians," "whom really we ought to pity, who of the articles necessary for Just heation takes those only that please them and are sweet, vis. faith and the Evergel, arguing: "I have only to believe and I shall be assent; and be the other, which is better and far from

¹ "Haneri Prophetta vetus ac nova," Lips., 1834, Prof., Ful. B, a. Dollinger, 1, p. 1294.

Epostoles duse J. Hameri et G. Wiceld, ' 1534, Fol. A 2 b, 3 a.

Dellinger, 1, p. 127 f.

* In. C. G. Murr, "Journal sur Kunstgesch, und Literatur," Tt. 10, Narnberg, 1761, p. 40 ff. Dollinger, 1, p. 166. Cp. our vol. 6., p. 40.

easy, viz. the putting to death of the old Adam, that they take good care to loave slone."1

The above is sufficient to show that there was a consensus of opinion in tracing back the moral decadence to the Lutheran doctrine of works. As against this there is a certain strangeness in the explanation variously given by Protestants of this real retrogression: The complaints of Luther and his preachers, so they aver, only prove that they were dissatisfied, as it was their right and duty to be, with what had been achieved in the moral order.—At any rate, the distressing results of the doctrine of faith alone proved strikingly how ineffectual had been all Luther's exhortations to good works.

Luther's Utterances in Favour of Good Works.

Many and earnest are Luther's exhortations to prove our faith by works of love towards God and our neighbour; to sinners he frequently speaks of the path of penance which they must tread; conversion he wishes to be accomplished with lively faith and the state of grace preserved by practical piety. It was assuredly not the lack of such counsels which occasioned the decline described above; this was rather due to the system itself, combined with the evil effects of the general overthrow of the old eccless-astical law and practice which safeguarded morals, and with the contempt aroused for the sacraments, for public worship and the spiritual authorities. History must, however, allow Luther's exhortations on behalf of good works and the keeping of the commandments to speak for themselves.

We may begin with his thesis: "We are bound to bring our will into entire conformity with the Divine Will." In accordance with this, in his "You der Freyhevt eynes Christen Menschen," he does not fail to speak agreeably with the teaching of the olden Church of the meastance God gives for the realous keeping of the commandments. "If you dosire to keep all the commandments, to be rid of your evil lusts and of an as the commandments enjoin and demand, then believe in Christ, for in Him I make bold to promise you all grace and rightcourness, peace and freedom. If you believe, then you have it; if you do not believe, you have it not. For what is impossible to you with all the works of the Law, of which there must be many though all to no profit, will be short and easy to you by faith. . . . The promises of God give both the command and the fulfilment." What he means to my is, that, by faith, we receive grace in order to wage a successful "conflict with min." Grace is, however, equivalent to faith. "Without grace," he had already taught before, "man cannot keep God a commandments." . "The old man . . is led by concuprecence." "But to faith all things are pessible through Christ."*

Werke," Wegan, ed., 1, p. 228; "Opp. lat. var.," 1, p. 321, n. 97.

Lucciolus (Nachtigall), "Evangel, Hustorie," 1525, pp. 445, 449. Döllinger, 1, p. 550.

Electricism he clearly teaches that faith alone is not nearly enough; to rely exclusively on this must indeed be termed "folly"; with the amutance of grace man must also keep the Law.

In syste of all he has to say against Moses and his barsh and terrifying " Law "-the Ten Commandments inclusive-when his is busy exalting the Evangel, he nevertheless has eccamonally high practs for the Decalogue on account of its agreement with the law of nature. His exposition of it contains much that it worth taking to heart.* Faith, he points out, shows us whence the strongth for issessing the Lee Commandments is to be drawn.

The Christian, according to a lengthy and beautiful passage in the Church Postile on a sermon for the Frest of the Conception), must "atruggle and fight" against his histe and must seek to result the darse of the wished one." "If we have been beptised and believe, we have received grace, and this contends with the evil inclinations within us and expels and destroys original was: then good and honest descriptor humility, charity, lorganizaty and all the virtues awaken in us, and at once good works begin to be performed with a cheerful heart. All this is done by the grace which we receive in haptern by faith in Christ; at is impossible for such grace to comess wife, but it must needs bring forth good Emphatic admoustions to preserve chartity and a resunder of the religious areass to be employed are also frequent with him, for aristance, in his ' Von guten Wereken, ' written in 1820 at Spaintin's instigation, to repel the charge that his teaching was antagorastic to ary striving after virtue, to mornisty or Christian works. He dedicated the writing to Duke Johann, the brother of the Saxon Elector. Chastity, he there mys, is indeed a hard matter, but it is set be acquired. " hvon were no other work commanded basedos chastity we should ad of us have enough to de, so dangerous and furnous in the [contrary] vice. . . . To get the better of all the requires labour and trouble, and in fact all the commandments of God teach us how important is the rightful performance of good works, may that it is improved of our own atrength even to plan a good work, let alone commence and Worke," Worm, ed., 7, p. 24; Erl. ed., 27, p. 180.

 Ibid., Weem, ed., 1 p. 145 f.; "Opp. lat. var.," l. p. 235 seg.
 "Werke," Erl. ed., 144, pp. 178 f., 182.
 Ibid., 21, p. 34 ff.
 Ibid., p. 84.
 Ibid., 15*, p. * 75 kg , 15%, p. 44.

accomplish it. . . . This work of chantity, if it is to be preserved, impels us to many other good works, to fasting and temperance, in order to result gluttony and drunkerness, to watching and early many in agits of our lanness and love for siumber, to strive and to labour in evercoming idleness. For gluttony and drashing, too much sleep, idleness and lostering are the weapons of applicativy, . . . These exercises, however, much not be carried further than is necessary to subdue unchastity, not to the extent of damaging our frame. The strongest weapone of all are prayer and the Word of God. . . . Thus you see that each one finus enough to do in himself and good works in pivity to perform. Yet now no one makes use of prayer, fasting, watching and ashour for this purpose, but looks upon these works as an ond in themselves, though the performance of these works of the Law cought to be regulated dusty as as to be ever more and more purified [the gentence contains Lither's usual perversion of Cathoric doctrine and practice). Other things also have been mentioned as to be avoided, such as out beds and clothing, unnecessary adornments, the accesty, eight and conversation of men or women, and much else conductive to charity. In all this no one can lay down a fixed rule and measure. Each one must decide for himself what thirgs and how many are helpful to chartity, and for how long ". Here he even pays a tribute to the increasering founded in bygone ages to leach the " young people discipling and cleaniness." Finally he mests that a good, strong faith " "helps great win this work," since "faith ever liveth and doth all our works."1

The ravings of the fanaties repeatedly furnished from with an occasion to one hasse good works more strongly and even to speak of a faith working by love.

He delike for their lawless beingstear and their presse of the Sprit, to some extent directed against ordinary works, called him into the areas. To call back the disturbers to a more moral life and to the considerations of chanty, he appealed to them to "exercise themselves in the faith that works to by chanty" (Gal v. 6). Even the Frestle of James now appeared to him good enough to quote, particularly the verse in 22) in "Be ye does of the the Willed and not nesteen only, decreasing your own selves "a from this Epistle is also him only the comparison of a dead faith, visual a faith not made using through charity, with the face as seen in a glass, which is merely the semblance of a countenance and not the reality."

It was the (analics again who in 1530 drew from him some elequent statements in favour of good works, because, so be said, they had inscrepensented is a doctrine that " Good works neither make a man passe and but out sen." They said " they would give their good works for a grow," and that all good works were not worth a population. Here he professes to see great danger in contempt for good works and the pervention of his teaching by ^{* £85}d., 10°, p. 210 f., op. Weim, ed., 0, p. 208 f.; 9, p. 293 f.

* 'Werke,' Weim, ed., 10, 3, p. 3 f., Erl. ed., 23, p. 206 the "devil's lying tengue." Good works, according to him, are eather to be esteemed very highly because they are God's own. " If it is a good work, then God has wrought it in and by me " ; * it was done for the houseur and glory of God and for the profit and salvation of my neighbour." He hamed had been far from questioning this and had merely taught that works did not conduce to piecy, i.e. "to justify the soul and to placete God " ; thin, on the contrary, was 'entirely the work of the One true God and of His grees." !

Just as during his public career Luther looked upon such statements as all the more useful assung they blunted the edge of the awkward inferences drawn from the new Evangel, and served to vindicate his action from the charge of loosening the bonds of morality, so, at the cime of his days, he was obliged in a similar way to hark back to the defence of good works against Antinomeasure, of which the principal spokesman was Johaan Agricola. It is true that the Antisomians based their contempt for the Law, which they said was barmful, and for the excessive respect for communications and good works which, according to them, still prevailed, on nothing less than Luther a own teaching. In reality it was to his advantage that their exaggivations forced him to explain away much that he had said, or at least to exercise greater caution. The encounter with Agricola the Antinomian will be described later (vol. w., zxiz., 3). In spite of his being thus compelled to take the Law and good works under his wing in this controversy, Luther pever, thes or later, put forward the true relation of the Law to the Gospel nor the real foundation of good works.* He became involved in contradictions, and to the end of his days it became more and more apparent how forced had been the introduction into his theology of good works and the keeping of the Law.

Nicholas Amsdorf, Luther's intimate friend and most docsic pupil, published in 1550 a tract entitled "That the proposition 'Good works are harmful to salvation' is a good and Christian one presched both by St. Paul and by Luther." Their "harmfulness" resided in their being regarded as mentonous for salvation. We may wonder what Luther would have thought of this writing had he been alive? In any case the Lutheran Formula of Concord of 1577 contains a mild protest against it: " The assertion that good works are necessary is not to be reprehended, seeing that it may be understood in a favourable sense ";" it also appeals to what had been laid down in the Augsburg Ibid., 30, 2, p. 214-63, p. 293, Preface to "Der Wiedertaufter. Lere" of Justus Menius.

" Opp. lat. var.," 6, pp. 418 seq., 434.

" Solida declaratio," 4, n. 15. Symbolische Bucher!"," p. 427, Confession; it could "not be gainsaid that, in both the Confession and the 'Apologia,' the words: 'Good works are necessary,' are frequently used."

As for the attitude of the Augsburg Confession, it declares concerning works—a declaration for which Melanchthon's cautious pen was solely responsible—" We also teach that such faith [in Christ, whereby man is justified] must produce good fruit and good works, and that we must perform all manner of good works which God has commanded, for God's sake ""

No one was so much concerned as Melanchthon in insisting that the performance of good works should be represented as indispensable to the people, particularly from the pulpit. It vexed him, the more prudent of the two, to hear Luther again and again, and that often in hyperbolical and paradoxical form, laying such stress on faith alone. How far Melanchthon's name may justifiably be quoted against what was undescrible in the olden Protestant teaching on works, should be clear from what has already been said concerning this theological benchman of Luther's (ep. vol. iii., p. 547 ff.).

Luther's admirers are wont to quote the following uttersace of his when praising his attitude towards works; "Good, pious works never made a good, pious man, but a good, prous man performs good, pious works. Wicked works never made a wicked man, but wicked men perform wicked works." That " wicked deeds never made a wicked man " he probably found some difficulty in really convincing many. If Luther meant that an unjust man or sinner, who is not cleansed by faith in Christ, can never act but wickedly, then it is the same error as we find in other passages and which is repeated in connection with the words just quoted: "Unless a man believes beforehand and is a Christian (* consecrated by faith'] all his works are of no account, but are vaia, foolish, criminal and damnably sinful." This is surely as much beside the mark as the above statement of Luther's concerning the relation between a "pious man" and "pious works." Of supernatural works that are memtorious for heaven what Luther adds is indeed correct;

^{*} Ibid., n. 14.

⁴ Art. 5. Cp. Art. 29. ⁴ Symbolische Bücher, ¹¹⁸⁹ pp. 40, 44. ⁵ Werks, ³ Weim, ed., 7, p. 12; Ed. ed., 27, p. 191, ⁴ Von der Freybeyt cynes Christen Menschen. ¹¹

WORKS FOR OTHERS' BENEFIT 477

"Hence, in every instance the person must first be good and pious previous to all works, and the good works follow and proceed from a good and pious person." We must, however, decline to accept Luther's other inferences, viz. that the sinner is not in a position to perform natural good works of his own, and that the just man does not become more righteous through good works.

Hence Luther's statement, however apparently ingenious, cannot remove the unfavourable impression produced by his doctrine of works. That it was highly valued by its author is plain from the number of times he repeats it under different forms. "Works do not make a Christian, but a Christian performs works," so he exclaimed in a sermon in 1528, summing up in these specious words the instruction he had just given, vis. that the faithful must struggle to remove whatever of evil there is in them, and that they must "work good to their neighbour," but not on any account try "to blot out sin by works, for this would be to shame and blaspheme God and Christ and to disgrace their own heritage," viz. Justification by faith alone."

Works of Charity. Luther and the Ages of the Past.

For the purpose of recommending the Lutheran doctrine of works it is sometimes urged that Luther, while slighting other works of less account, assigned a place of honour to active works of charity, done for the sake of our neighbour, that he placed them on a firmer moral basis than they had hitherto occupied and promoted them so far as the unfavourable circumstances of his age allowed. A few words on the conception and particularly on the practice of charity as advocated by him may serve as a fit conclusion to the present section.

First, we may mention that Luther is disposed to exaggerate the importance of works of chanty done to our neighbour.

It was an unjustifiable and paralysing restriction on the pious impulse towards works pleasing to God that Luther embodied in the rule he repeatedly lays down regarding works, viz. that they must be directed exclusively towards the benefit of others. "On this earth," so he teaches in his Church postils, "man does not live for the sake of works, nor that they may profit him, for he has no need of them, but all works must be done for the sake of our neighbour." "Thus must all works be done, that we see to it that they tend to the service of other people, impart to them the right faith and bring them to Christ's Kingdom." They bring them the "right faith" when they serve to "quiet their conscience." Thus even here the Kingdom of God, which consists in the forgiveness of sins, must also play its part.

^{1 &}quot;Werke," Erl, ed., 17", p. 11 Cp. above, p. 418, n. 7.

Catholic doctrine recognises a wider field for good works. It regards as such even the works which the faithful perform directly for their own soul without any reference to their neighbour, such as self-conquest in contending against one's own passions, or those works which are concerned primarily with honouringGod whether in public worship or in the private life of the Christian. Luther himself, at least incidentally, also knows how to speak of the value of such works, though thereby he contradicts his other statements like the above.

If, however, we neglect the principle, we have to admit, that Luther's frequent exhortations to neighbourly charity and kindness contain some fine and truly Evangelical thoughts. With deep feeling he expresses his sorrow that his admonstrons are not heeded to the extent he would have wished.

In his statements already quoted concerning the corruption of morals consequent on the change of religion, we have heard him several times lamenting the notonous falling off in private benevolence and the quite remarkable decrease of public works of Christian charity. Everywhere avance reigns supreme, so we have heard Luther repeatedly exclaim, and a reprehensible indolence in the doing of what is good has spread far and wide; everything is now different from what it had been "in the time of the moaks and parsons," when people "founded and built" right and left, and when even the poorest was anxious to contribute."

His defenders now declare, that he "unlocked the true ^{}Part to these save on the scarcity and amaliness of contributions towards Divine weeksp and prescling we may add two other utterances of Luther's given by Mikhler ("KG," 3. pp. 149 and 160). Nobles, burghers and paramete were all intent on letting the riergy starve that the Evangel might cause to be proclaimed.—"Unless something a done mon, there will be an and in this land to Evangel, postors and schools; they will have to run away, for they have nothing, and go about looking like haggard ghosts."

source of charity " by denying any meritorious character to works, thus sending to limbo the imperfect, medizval motive of charity and substituting a better one in its place, vis. a "grateful love springing from faith." Lather a own words have been used to decry earlier ages, as though charity then had "merely had itself in view," people in those days having been intent solely on laying up merit " for them and theirs."

It is perfectly true that the Catholic Church glodly emphasism the reward charity brings to the giver.

If in the times previous to Luther's day, both in the Middle Ages and before, the Church frequently exteded the temporal and everiasting reward of charity, and d this proved to the faithful an inventive, she could at least in so during apprai to those passages in the thought itself which promise to the charitable a heavenly recommence. Yet the thought of this reward did not enclude other high and worthy motives. So little were such motives alighted in the mediceral practice of charity, that, ado by side with the heavenly reward, the original deeds of foundations, gills and prous legacies still extant allege all kinds of other reasons, for instance, compassion for the helpless and concern for their budily and apintual welfare, or the furtherance of the common good by the establishment of institutions of public utility. One formula frequently used which, taken literally, seems actually to ignore all ment and reward, runs variously : " For God a sake only ', " for God', or, "an order to please Him with temporal goods." Thus the author of the "Wybegortim fair. alie frummen Christenmernchen. † 6 German work of edification, wrote in 1649; 'Thanks to tend's grace there are still in our tower many hundreds of brothers and sisters who have united themselves out of Christian charity and compresson for the purpose of serving the poor sick people, the intim, plaguestricken and lepers, purely for God's sale."

Dake George of Hammy in his reply to Lather's "Widder dea Meachler au Dresen," really expresses the metive for the active Cathour charity formerly so his while displayed, when he speaks of the great possessors given by past ages of which the religious revolt had roshed the Church, of the "gifts freely given by nebles, burghers and peasants out of ardent Christian love and gratitude for His sacred bitter Passon, bright bood and guiltless death, to element, purch churches, altern, chapele, cells, hospitals, religious houses, crafts," etc.*

Nother did such materes or the motive of reward curtail the spirit of charity towards the cline of the Middle Ages, as some Protestants have chosen to assert. On the contrary they served to animate it.

Mayence, 1500, Bl. 7.

[&]quot; Luthers Werks," Erl. ad., 25° (where the whole of the Duke's roply is printed), p. 144.

On the base of the data furnished by German archives a modern historian remarks of these times: "The quest of Christion charity showed theelf most active to the foundation of benevulent institutions, in which request hardly any ago can compare with the Diff century . Towards the come of the Myfelio Agen the grite to hospitals, pret houses and heaten were remply minumerable " , such is the opinion of another researcher." Evon G. Uilborn, in his "tomehirl to der christischen Liebestatigkest." had to admit . " No period did so much for the poor on the Middle Ages," though agreeably to the standard of his preuing. Luthernnarn, this nut her would fain make out that good works then were done out of mere egotism.

Other Pretestant authorities allow, that, even according to Luther a own admission, the Cattobe charsty for exceeded that, displayed by the new faith. "Here" (among the Catholica), sava one hasteriar, "Confraternation for the care of the poor and nick arose in the 14th and 27th centuries which for surpassed anything hitherto known in the purity of their some and their entraordinary arkievements . . . Among the Cathouse the seform in the numning of the sick proceeded from Spain, which also produced the men who learned largest in the Catholic Counter Reformation, v.s. the Jesuts and the Dominicans. From Spain came the model of the modern hospital with the nursing staff as we now know it." 'The Protestant communities during the two contures which followed the Reformation abound a great lack of fruitfuness as regards works of sharity " "The hospitals in the Protestant districts, with few exceptions, were and rumnined bad, nor was anything done to improve them."1 Although Latter a pranoworthy efforts to awaken charity term not altogether wasted, yet neither his success in some localities. nor the supposed purer and higher open to be introduced into deeds. of love were so as served as to beer comparison with the charity an architously rules ated on the Catholic arts. On the contrary, his complaints costern the engineers that in Lathern circles works of county were as a rule larned by the lack of that wary spirit of perty which doubt have been so manufest. (More in

vol. vi., xxxv., 4)

In 1528 he told the inhabitarte of Wittenberg. "This week your oferium will be sole ted. I hear that people my they will give nothing to the collectors, but will turn them near. Well, thank took ! I on most ungrateful ereatures, who are so gradging with your money, reliate to give at ything, and, not enterled with this, been abuse on the numbers of the Church ! I wish you a Lappy year. I am so hornfied, that I do not know whether to continue presching any larger to you, you rude brutes who coanot give even four half pence ungrudgingly". It was a

8. Riesler, "Gench, Bayeria," 3, 1889, p. 800

R. Wackermagel (* Bailer Zeitschr. f. Gesch.," 3, 1903, p. 101).
 Dietrich * Cuer Gesch der Krankengeleger* in Lehn-Jacobschn-Movee ". Hitle der Kramansereorgang und Kramburpflege," I, Borna, 1899, p. 47 ff.

ON THE FLORENCE HOSPITALS 481

disgrams, he says, that so for the fiscal authorities had been obliged to provide for the churches, the schools and the poor its tree hospitals, whose it was the proper's duty as Christians to support. " Now that you are called upon to give four beggarty held pence, you feel it a burden." "Decervers will come who will was fat at your expense or happened formerly (in Catholic times). I am every that you have arrived at such a giorious state of freedom, free from all tyreats and Papets, for, thankies brotes that you are, you don't deserve this Evangelical treasure. Unline you trend your ways and act differently I shall cross to proach to you in order not to cost pourly before some and to give what in holy to the drugs, and shall proclaim the Gospel to my real students who are the pour beggar-men. Pormerly you gave so much to the wicked sequents [the tatholic dergy] and now ! ! Aready, the year before, he had vigorously corresponded from the pulpet, though, as it would appear, all to no purpose: " Amorgot those who hear the Word, fasts is dull and charity has grown ecid and hope is at on end, etc. There is no one who pities his brother's distress. Once upon a tene we gave a hundred, two hundred, five hundred, or even a thousand pieces of gold to the monks, canons or prests for the building of monastenes and churches. To-day no one can be found who will give a coin, let alone a purce of gold, for the poor. For the reason tend sends His jurigments on the world and current the earth on account of the contempt for His Word and His Evangel; but we may look for yet worse things in the future."4

Amongst the reminiscenses of his journey to Italy, Luther returned a kindly memory of the charity as practiced by the Cothours, particularly at Florence. We read in Lauterbach a Dary on Aug. 1, 1530: "Then Luther epoke of chanty in Italy and how the hospitals there were eared for. They are lorated in princely buildings, are amply supplied with food and drink, the acremate are most despect and attentive, the physiques very shilled, the bedding and cipthing are perfectly clean and the beds are even painted. When a patient is brought in, he has at once to strip, an inventory of his clothen is made in the presence of a notary and they are then kept carefully for him. Then he m dressed in a white shirt and put in a nice parated hed with clean shorts, and after a little while two physicians are at his bedside ; corvants come and being him food and drink in perfectly clean glass gublets, which they do not touch even with a hager carrying everything on a tray. Even the greatest lacker come there, muffled up can pletely so as to be unrecognisable, in order to surve the poor for some days, after which they return to their horres. At Fiorence I have even what great eace is bestowed on the hospitals. Also on the founding homes where the children are admirably installed, fed and taught, are all dressed alike and un the enner colour and treated in a right fatherly way."*

^{*} Cp. "Colloq.," ed. Banderil, 2, p. 201; "Werke," Erl. ed., 53, p. 455 f., Table-Talk.

¹ "Werke," Weigh, ed., 27, p. 400 ff (freen notes).

Isid. 24, p. 454 (from notes).

5. Other Innovations in Religious Doctrine

The absence of any logical system in Luther's theological and moral views is so far from being denied by Protestants who know his theology that they even reproach Luther's opponents for expecting to find logic in him. No system, but merely "the thought-world of a great religious man" is, so they say, all that we may look for in his works; it is true that he had a "general religious theory," but it was "faulty, in its details not seldom contradictory, and devised for a practical and polemical object." "Luther was no dogmatic theological or man of system," hence his individual sayings must not always be treated as though they were parts of a system.

There can be no doubt that this is a defect in a teacher who comes forward as the founder of a denomination and as the restorer of Christian doctrine, and who, in his quality of "Prophet of the Germans," declares: "Before me people knew nothing." After all, precision and coherence of doctrines form a test of their truth.

In reality the facts of the case are only indicated in a veiled way in the Protestant admissions just recorded. The truth is, as the reader has already had many an occasion to see, that, with Luther, one assertion frequently invalidates the other. Even in the field of moral teaching we find him at utter variance with himself, and his contradictions become particularly glaning as soon as he passes from theory to practice. Here it is easy to seize the "consummate contradictions of his theology," of which a present-day Protestant theologian ventures boldly to speak; we may also subscribe to what this same writer says, viz. that Luther hardened his heart against certain consequences of his own religious principles. (Cp. p. 415, 447; vol. ii., p. 312, etc.)

The Regula Fidei.

Such a demal of the consequences of the principles of his doctrine lies first and foremost in the fact that Luther summed up in a Rule of Faith the various dogmas to which it was his intention to remain true. The "regula fidei," such as he wished to bequeath to posterity, he saw expressed in the Confession of Augsburg, and in the oldest Œcumenical. Creeds of the Church.

Google

¹ A. Hamack, "Dogmengeach,," 3*, p. 733 ff ; 3*, p. 819 ff.

It has already been seen that the radicalism involved in his religious attitude should by rights have issued in a freedom, hay, beence, which would have rendered impossible any binding formulance of faith.

It is also the opinion of most modern Protestant theologians that the definition of doctrine which began with the Confession of Augsburg, or in fact with the Articles of Marburg, really constituted an unjustifiable encroachment on the freedom of religious thought mangurated by Luther. Luther indeed invested these doctrinal formularies with all the weight of his authority, yet, according to these theologians, they represented a "narrowing" of the Evangelical ideas advocated by him; nor can it be gainsaid that the revolutionary ideas for which Luther stood from about 1590 to 1523 justify such strictures.

"This promising spring," writes Adolf Harnack, a representative of theological freedom, "was followed by no real assumer. In those years Luther was lifted shove himself and second to have overcome the insistations of his peculiar temperament."... But Luther unfortunately reverted to his limitations. Nor were they "merely a light vesture, or as some would fain have us believe, due simply to lack of comprehension on the part of Melanchthon and other henchmen, for Luther himself new in them the very foundation of his strength and made the fullest use of them as such."

In other words, his contradiction with his own original principles became to him, so to speak, a second nature. He was in deadly carriest with the dogmas which he retained, and which were continued in the official Articles of facts. In so far, therefore, he may be said to have turned away from the cornequences of his own action and to have striven to slain the door which he had opened to unbelief and private judgment.

Of the Confession of Augsburg, the most important of these declarations of faith, Harnack says: "That the Gazasi of the Reformation found masterly expression in the "Augustana," that I mannet admit. The "Augustana" founded a teaching Church i on it must be hid the blaine for the narrowing of the incomment of reform. Could each a thing have been written previous to 1826, or even previous to 1829 !."

After admitting elsewhere the advantages of the Confession of Augsburg, Harnack proceeds: "It is possible by retraining our steps to arrive through it at the header Evangelical ideas without which there would never have been a Reformation or an

I See above, vol. ni., p. 5 ff. 1 * DG, * 34, p. 811.

"Asymmen." With regard to their author, however, it is no use blinking the fact, that here Meinschthon undertook, or rather was forced to undertoke, a task to which his give and his charneter were not equal. 1. "In the theology of Meiaschthon the meralist, who stands at the side of Luther the Evengeist, we discrementerpis to amend Luther's theology ... Meiaschthon, however, felt himself cramped by having to act as the guardina of Luthermann. We exceed take it ill if Lutherma prefer to see with Luther their been, rather than submit to be put in Melanchthon's looding strings."

Harnack and those who think like him are even more antagonfetic to the later creeds of Latheranam than to the Confession composed by Melanchthon. "The symbolic age when the "Lattierun Church gave 'definite expression' to her will is nothing more than a feele convenue. 'This Lutherns Church as an actual body," save Carl Muter, "never really existed and the ecoleones of the errectest Lather faction were just the worst enemies of such a union, . . . Thus to speak of creeds of the Lutheren Church involves an historic impossibility 1991. According to these theologians Protestantism must hark back to Lathern original principles of freedom. Moreover, argues Hernack, Protestantism has on the whole already severted to this earlier standpoint. "We are not formlying the clear testimany of history wher we find to Lother a Christianity and in the first begannings of the Reformation all that present-day Protestartum has developed, though amodat weakness and constraint; nor when we state that Lathera idea of faith is still to-day the moving quest of Protestantians, however many or however few may have made it their own." Lather's "most effective preparations," according to him, may well be allowed to stand as the legislate of the Evangelical Churches", it is plant that they do not lead to a nero - degreatic Unsatinfity, but to true Christian by consisting in the " disposition which the Father of Jesus Christ awakens in the beart through the Grazel? Luther himself has only to be rightly approciated and "allowed to permiss Lather

However repeatedly insists that Earlier by setting ands all authority on dogses, whether of the Church, the hierarchy or tradition, and distributed the hinding character of any "doctrine." By his at ach co-all authority be dealt a mortal blow at the vital principle of the arment Church, traceable back to the mound century. According to him "every doctrinal formulary of the past required a species proof", the objective proof was to him the only authority. "How then could there be authority when the objective proof failed or werner to demonstrate the contrary 7." To police of the posed is within the province of each tasks about, and increasing as he is constituted, the small will be

P. 694, n. 1. P. 894.

² P. 811 Carl Muller, "Presse. Johrb.," 83, Hit. 3, p. 147.

C * DG of B1 p. 6. 6. smitt et in the 4 houtet sonja different. "Luther even at the most entired moment, when he enemed to stend in the greatest need of the formal authority of the letter—stat put allow largered to be overswed or his mouth to be closed even by the Appetius Creed. He mired involved himself inter in limitations and restrictions," "but there can be no doubt... that by his previous listeric behaviour towards them he had undermined all the formal authorities of Cathelicism."

^{4.} Mark, p. Mark, mark 25, p. march.

On this functionents, question of the preschiety of a "regular files" in Lither's case, we may listen to the opinion of another esteemed Protestant historian of late years.

Friedry & Engines, as too much prined "Goschichte des gelehrten Unterral to, writen. The Word of God does not suffer as a "regula fider," but a personal authority is also meded to decide on questions of ductrine, this is what the Ligher of 1535 save and thereby configure the Lather of 1521, who refused to allow anyone on earth to point out to him the faith unless he homelf cruid gother its truth from the Word of God. Had Lather shided by his rejection of all human authority he should have declared t On the interpretation of Europeans there is no final court of appeal, each one believes or erre at his own pont. . . . What Lether had related on in 1521 against the Papiets, via inability to refute lum from therepages, was used against him in his own strugglo with the "fanative" For the confuting of heretics a rase of faith is resided and what a grow, a living one to decide in each cure, The principle of 1521, to allow to authority on earth to presente the faith, a marchical. On these iges there can be no. Church " with an 'exumen destrine ' of its condidates and Violations of the clergy. This the References also saw and thus there was nothing left for them, if they were to retain a. Church, than to net up their own authority in the stead of the authority of Popo and Councils. On one vexations point they were, however, at a loss. Against the inter Littley it was always promble to appeal to the Luther of Worses. The starting point and resem distreof the whole References was the repulsation on principle of all human author ty in matters of faith, after this, to find Lather installed as Pipe, was practely pleasing. If anyons stands in need of a Pepe he would surely be better advaced in stirking to the real are at frome. . . . The hole in Luther's teaching still remeins a hole in the principle of the Protestant Church to-day : There can be no earthly authority in matters of faith, and : High an authority there must be, this is an anticiony which her at its very cost. Nor m the artinomy accairatal, but ion in the very testure of the center and is expensed as efter as we good of the 'Protestant Church.' If there is to be a Church . . . then the fact vidual in set submit himself and his "lasth" to the "faith" of the community. Paulsen, who had spoken of " Luther as Popu," refers to Luther a own remark when taking his sent with Eugenbages in the carriage in which he went to siret Vergerio the Paper Nutron to . Here go the German Pops and Cantinal Ponterunus, God a chosen matruments . Luther a semark was of course spoken in jest, but the jest "was only possible against a background of butter earnest"; Luther frequently dalled with this idea; "for the position Luther occupied, ages even after his death, there really was no other compension to be found.

* 3% p. 867 f.

... With the above jest Luther reduced himself of absurdam." "
—Such consures are in reality more in place than those eulogies of Luther's exclamation at Worms in 1521 on the freedom of Bible conviction, into which orthodox Protestant biographers of Luther sometimes lapse.

Some Peculiarities of the New Doctrine on the Sucrements, Perticularly on Baptism.

The theological pillars of the edifice of public worship are the seven sacraments, the visible signs ordained by Christ by which grace is given to our souls. Held in honour even by the Nestorians and Monophysites as witnesses to ecclesiastical antiquity, they enfold and hallow all the chief events of human life. Luther debased the effect of the sacraments by making it something wholly subjective, produced by the recipients themselves in virtue of the faith infused into them. by God, whereas the Church has ever recognised the sacraments as sublime and mysterious signs, which of themselves work in the receiver (" ex opere operato") according to the extent of his preparation, Christ having made the grace promised dependent on the outward signs instituted by Himself. Luther, on the other hand, by declaring the sacraments mere symbols whereby faith is strengthened, operative only by virtue of the recipient's faith in the pardon and forgiveness of his sins, reduced them to the status of empty pledges for soothing and consoling consciences. Only later did he again come nearer to the Catholic doctrine of the " opus operatum." With his view, however, that the sole object of the sacraments is to increase the " fides specialis," we arrive again at the point which for Luther is the sum total of religion, viz.; "mere forgiveness."

He was not at all conscious of the contradiction involved in his vigorous insistence on the absolute necessity of the sacraments for salvation. From his standpoint Carlstadt was far more logical when he said: "If Christ [alone] is peace and assurance [of salvation], then lifeless creatures [the sacramental, outward signs] can surely not satisfy or make secure."

Vol. 13, p. 213 ff

[&]quot; Cp. Mohier, " Symbolik," 30, Cp. above, vol. in., p. 10 f.

Luther mised no objection to infant baptism. He also wished it, and haptism in general, to be given in the usual way in the name of the Trinity. But how did he try to solve the difficulty arising from his theory of the sacraments: If the sacrament only works in virtue of the faith of the receiver and the effect is merely an increase of faith, of what advantage can it be to the infant who is meanable of belief? He endeavoured to remedy the defect with the help of the faith of the congregation.

Meeting difficulties on this line he did not shrink from claiming a perpetually recurring muscle, and proposed to assume that, during the act of baptism, the new-born infant was momentarily endowed by God with the use of reason and filled with faith.

In his "De captivitate bebylenica" he had already attempted to cut the Gordian knot presented by Infant baptism by this assumption, which, however arbitrary, is quite intelligible from his psychological standpoint. Thanks to the believing prayer of the congregation who present the children for haptism, so he said, faith is infused into them and they thus become regenerate. In 1523 he states that children have a hidden faith. "From that time onwards the tendency of his teaching was to require faith from candidates for baptism. . . . Even after the Concord he continued to speak exactly as before." The Bible teaches nothing about infant baptism. Yet Luther declares in 1545 in a set of theses: " It is false and outrageous to say that little children do not believe, or are unworthy," while at the head of the theses these words stand: " Everything that in the Church, which is God's people, is taught without the Word of God, is assuredly false and unchristian."2

It is of interest to follow up his arguments for the faith of infants. In 1522 already he had attempted in a letter to prove to Melanchthon the possibility of such unconscious faith. He referred him to the circumstance, which, however, is irrelevant, " that we retain the faith while asleep or otherwise engaged." Moreover, since to him who believes, everything is possible with God, so, too, to the congregation which prays for the children; the children are presented Köntlin, "Luthem Theol.," 29 p. 237 f.

 "Werke," Fol. ed., 65, p. 170, "Wider die axxii. Artikel der Teologisten von Loven, by the congregation to the Lord of all, and He, by His Omnipotence, kindles faith in them. In the same letter, aimed at the Anabaptists, who were then beginning to be heard of, we find an emphatic appeal to the authority and belief of the Church ("toting orbin constant confessio"), which, as a rule, Luther was so ruthless in opposing. " It would be quite improus to deny that infant baptism agrees with the belief of the Church; to do so would be tantamount to denying the Church"; it was a special mirrore that infant baptism had never been attacked by heretica; there was therefore good reason to hope that Christ, now, would trample the new formen "under our feet." Luther forgets that the ancient Church was not hampered by such a beel of Achilles as was his own teaching, viz. that the sacraments owed all their efficacy to faith. We can, however, quite understand his admission to Melanchthon: "I have always expected that betan would lay violent hands on this weak spot, but he has chosen to stir up this permissions quarrel, not through the Papata, but with the help of our own people."1 The rise of the Anabaptist heresy was indeed merely a natural reaction against Luther's doctrine of baptism.

Seeing that the doctrine of baptism is of such importance to the Christian Church, we may be permitted to consider the inferences regarding the sacrament of baptism drawn in modern times from Luther's conception of it, and from his whole attitude towards faith and Christianity. A domestic dispute among the Protestants at Bremen in 1905 on the validity of baptism not administered according to the usages of the Church, led to a remarkable discussion among theologians of broader views, some of whom went so for as to argue in Luther's name and that of his Reformation, that baptism should be abolished.

Johannes Gotterhick in "Die Lehre der Reformation von der Taufo" (1906) defended the opnion that, according to the real views of the Reformers, haptism was valid even when conferred without any mention of the Trimity —O. School, on his aids,

* To Melanchthon from the Wartburg, Jan. 13, 1321, "Belef-wecheel," 3, p. 273 i. Because remon is "diametrically opposed to faith and glears only has a smudge on a lantern" (p. 160), people, on he says, "would believe better were they a little less reasonable." (p. 162). But "even though it were true, which it is not," and even were we to allow that infants do not believe at all, are without ressent and cannot group the Word of God, would their baptism therefore "be wrong "? Even then it would have its value.

pointed out in his book "Die dogmatische Behandlung der Taufichre in der modernen positiven Theologie " (1906), that a contradiction with the principle of the Referencian was apparent. even in Litther's own theology, massuich as, according to this provipie, hoptum should merely be the preclaiming of the Word of God; in the coveragely of baytime, according to the Reformation tour hing, which should be taken aurously, "the Word is not "; bactum is the execut declaration that the child has been received into the congruences and the bestowni on it of the promise of enivation, hence requires no repetition. "As to when the Word works faith in them) we do not know, nor mot accounty that throtogy should know " ; the power of God knows the day and the hour." The question i "Can baption to regarded rightly as the exclusive act of sweepton into the Church 1.1 was nowered negatively by Rietschel in an article under that title in the Dentacho Zestacherts für Kirchenrecht, im which ho too appeals to Lother. At any rate Rieterkel's conclusion at that, aines Luther makes the Christian state dependent on faith, the baptureal act as such cannot, according to him, he of any escential suportance , he tainhe it presible to complete Luther a dostrine on baptism in the light of that of Ewings and Calvin, who were of opinion that the children of Christian parents, by their very birth were received into the Church.

Luther's attitude towards these questions was treated of more in detail by the editor of the Deutsch Evangelische Mitter,

Erich Haupt, Professor of theology at Hallo. 1

Haupt agrees with finitischick as to the proschibity of duearding the Trinitarian formula in haption, in that, also Retechel, all he considers necessary in the liturgical retention of some definite form of words. He also subscribes in principle to Returbels contention that it is promble to enter the Courch without bightens. Going even further, however, he deriarm with record to Lather, that it was not even necessary to horrow from Zwingli and Calvin as Rietechel had proposed. "I believe the admission that advance may be accured even without Implicate, is a necessary executary of Lather's theories taken in the himp. One thing that he at the bottom of Lighter's doctrine of the sacraments is that the calvation bestowed by a sacrament is none other than that communicated by the word of the prescher. . . . Nay, the successions is morely a particular form in which the Evangel comes to mer . But wherever there is faith, there is consuming with God, and faith may be wherever there is the World of God. Just as it was said of the hipport. "crede at mandaments," so also it might be easily "areas at beginned to " . " To deny this would not merely be to escribe a magnal and the Laured effect to the apparent, but would also arryly the desial of the first principle of all Evangstiens Christimesty, vis. that for men a entration nothing further is necessary than to accept in faith the offer of God's grace given him in the ^{*} P 256. * Yol. 17, No. 2. * Deutsch-Ev Bt.," 32, 1997, p 651 ff. Hed., p. 713 ff.

Grend In this the Reformation was amply holding to the words of Scripture (Mk. gvs. 16)," where, in the second part (" He that believeth net shall be condemned. A hapteon is not mentioned. -Houpt, his Restochel, drawn attention to the fact, that, according to Luther, the unbelowing Christian, in spite of bapture, a sewardly no better than a beatise. * Nevertheless Houge is unwilling to allow that all children of Christian parents should simply be declared members of the Christian Church on decount of their birth and regardies of baptism, for encoural Pennone, to be considered Christians, they must be inducted into the congregation by the act of haptarm, faithough it is " a ingreal outcome of the Reformer a opinions that instances may occur where the Gospel awakens faith, and thereby meorporates in the congregation people who have never been haptered, but this to the mysoble congregation of the 'erre credentes,' not the out-word, vimble, organized Church . In order to enter children into the latter, the parents must express their wish; this is the meaning of the excessions of bactum : the fact remains, that, dimming the magical effect fermerly arer bed to baption, the proregal thing is, "not Christian parentage as such, but the will of the parents as expressed in some way or other, "t

These vigorous attempts to similar such ultra modern views behind Lather's authority, and to make him required for consequences of his doctrine, which he had been unwilling to face, have a common ground and starting point.

Withelm Herrmann, the Maching theologian, in the "Zeitwhich for The legic and Earths," that expresses himself on the subject 5 . 5 Christians are becoming more and more conscious," he eave. I that a retunor which must been its one is on an amount to "degrees sevented by God" to at variance with elements of wholaship which they can no longer deny." He speaks of the distress of cornetence into which the Church, by her demanding disent to revealed doctrine, plunges prople as soon as, under the tribuence of education, they have evene to see what alone can teduce horset assent to any size " (vis. the fact "that one avolves it for assert! ") Lather was himself scarcely acquainted. with such tenship of consumer concerning faith, notwithstanding the many question troubles he had to endure. On the contrary, he unbentatingly exight and found a source of strength in "We about be enterputural faith. Hermann continues unable to earne from the difficulty had not the true Christian understanding of faith, i.e. of program, been recovered at the From that standpoint ' any demand for an Reformation. mount to revealed disctrone may well be reportated 🐪 For it was the teaching of fathers Reformation that faith "rount he expensioned as the gift of God if it is to be the *need at apentuable e to " quarattally " super natures." Thus, however, could not to required of all. The demand a subscence of faith start and Werke," Ecl. ed., 40, p. 162. Cp. Bietschel, ibid., p. 274.

¹ P. 651

 P. 653.
 I. 717.
 Vol. 18, 1906, p. 146.

THE SACRAMENT OF PENANCE 491

"embodies the lake Roman principle" that everything depends on the "docuton to acquiesce in a doctrine," and not on the "experienced power of a personal life." "To lend a hand and clear a path for the chief discovery of the Reformation is the grandest task of theology within the Protestant Church."

Luther by so incomently emphasing personal religious experience and by his repudiation of all objective ecclesiastical authority capable of putting before mankind the contents of faith, certainly came very near that which is here represented as the "chief discovery" of the innovations undertaken by him (see above, pp. 403, vol. iii , 8 ff.). But what would the Wittenberg "lover of the Bible and Apostle of the Word" have said to the claim of modern scholars who wish simply to surrender revelotion? The passages in which he so indignantly censures the unbelief of his day cannot but recur to one.1

Luther arbitrarily reduced the sacraments to two; "there remain," he says, "two sacraments; haptism and the Supper." With regard to Penance his attitude was wavering and full of contradiction. In later years he again. came nearer to the Catholic teaching, arguing that Penance must also be a sacrament because, as he said in 1545, "it contains the promise of and belief in the forgiveness of sins."4 He had much at heart the retention of confession and absolution under some shape or form as a remedy against the moral disorders that were creeping in. 1 Yet, according to him, Penance was only to be regarded as the "exercise and virtue of baptism," so that the number of the meraments underwent no actual increase.

Here, as everywhere else, the changeableness of Luther's

The better to understand the strange (though by no means unique) attitude of this professor of theology, see the" Zestschr für Theol, und Kirche," 18, pp. 228 ff. 389 ff., and more particularly 74 ff., where he defends his proposals for the remody of the "lamentable state of present-day Protestantism"; also 17, 1907, pp. 1 ff., 315 ff.—On the above question see also Ernst Bunge, "Der Lehrstreit über die Kindertaufe innerhalb der Lutherischen Kirche," Camel, 1900, with Preface by Ad. Stocker,

² Cp. above, vol. ii., p. 398 fl.

³ Werke, Weim. ed., 26, p. 508; Erl. ed., 30, p. 371 is "Vom Abendmal Christi Bekentma," 1528.

^{* &}quot;Werke," Erl. ed., 65, p. 173: "Widder die xxxii Artikel der Teologisten von Löven." Cp. Köstlin, "Luthern Theol., 21, p. 247 * Werke, Weim ed., 26, p. 507; Erl. ed. 30, p. 371. Cp.

^{*} Ibid., p. 508=371. In the passage, Erl. ed., 21, p. 140, immediately after the portion of the sentence cited by Mostkin. "The third interament which has been called Penance," there follows: "Which is nothing else but haptism; for," etc.

doctrinal opinions is deserving of notice. The numerous instances where he relinquishes a position previously held and virtually betakes himself to another, are scarcely to the credit either of his logic or of his foresight. Such wavering and groping hither and thither is the stamp of error. In the "Histoire des variations" which might be written on the fate of Luther's views even during his lifetime, much would be found truly characteristic of them.

One sacramentarian doctrine, which to the end of his life be would never consent to relinquish, was, as we know, the Presence of Christ in the Supper. And relentless as he was in combating the Sacrifice of the Mass (see below, p. 506 ff.), yet he insisted steadfastly on the literal acceptance of Christ's words of institution: "This is My Body."

His Teaching on the Supper.

Luther's retention of the Presence of Christ in the Eucharist may to some extent be explained by the influence which, side by side with the Bible, tradition and the authority of the Church still exercised over him, at least on such points as did not call for modification on account of his new doctrine of Justification. He had grown up in thus faith, and was accustomed to give practical proof of it even when on other scores he had already broken with the Church. In this matter Scripture presented no difficulty. Had he shared Zwingh's rationalistic leanings it is likely that, like him, he might have sought for some other interpretation of the words of institution than the obvious and literal one. It is also possible that the mysticism to which he was addicted in early years may have contributed to make him acknowledge the "mysterium tremendum" of the Sacrament, as he terms it in the language of olden days.

It is true there came a time—according to him the year 1519-1520—when he felt strongly tempted to throw the Sacrament overboard, because, as he says in the well-known words, "I could thus have given a great smack in the face to Popery". At that time I "wrestled and struggled and would gladly have escaped." But from the plain text of the Bible, he had, so he declares, been unable to free himself. This statement, which is on the whole worthy of belief, we find in "Eyn Brieff on die Christen su Straspurg" which he published in 1825, and it is further corroborated by the fact, that he there refers to two men who had been anxious to move him to the denial of the Presence of Christ, but who had failed to convince him. The two, whose names he does not mention, were probably Cornelius Hendriks Hoen, a Dutchman, and Frana Kolb of Boden, whose letters to Luther, in 1522 and 1524, trying to induce him to accept the Zwinglian sense of the Sacrament, still exist.

When Carlstadt began his attack on the Real Presence. this, in view of the then situation, so Luther declares in his letter to the people of Strasburg, merely "confirmed his opinion." " Even had I not believed it before, I should at once have known that his opinions were nought, because of his worthless, feeble stuff, devoid of any Scripture and based only on reason and concest." Offended vanity and annoyance with Carlstadt were here not without their effect on Luther; to deny this would argue a poor acquaintance with Luther's psychology. It is true that the arguments of his opponent were very weak; it was not without reason that Luther speaks of his " stuff and nonsense " and " indiculous tales." He ranks the objections of the two letter-writers mentioned above higher than the proofs adduced by Carlstadt; at least they " wrote more skilfully and did not mangle the Word quite so badly." Luther was, however, tactless enough to give the Strasburgers a glimpse of the secondary motives which led him to defend the Presence of Christ so strongly and defantly from that time forward. He complains that Carlstadt was making such an ado as though he wanted " to darken the sun and light of the Evangel," so " that the world might forget everything that had been taught them by us [by Luther] bitherto." "I have up till now managed well and rightly in all the main points, and whoever says the contrary has no good spirit; I trust I shall not spoil it in the matter of the externals on which alone prophets such as these lay stress." a

It is unnecessary to show anew here how Luther's later defence of the Real Presence in the Eucharist against the Zwinglians contains indubitable evidence in its virulence

Dec. 15, 1524, "Werks," Weim, ed., 15, p. 394; Erl. ad., 53, p. 274 ("Briefwechsel," 5, p. 83). On the pair, see Enders, "Briefwechsel," 3, p. 412.
 P 393 f.= 273 f.

that Luther felt hurt. This personal element is, however, quite insufficient for one to base upon it any suspicion as to the genuineness of his convictions.

If, on the other hand, we consider the strange and arbitrary form he gave to the doctrine of the Supper, more particularly by insisting that the sole aim and effect of communion is to inspire faith in the personal forgiveness of ans, then his belief in the presence of Christ appears to a certain extent to harmonise with his peculiar theological views. Amidst the storm of his struggle after certainty of salvation the piedge of it which thrust bestows in the Sacrament seems to him like a blessed anchor. That this Body was "given" for us, and this blood shed for us, and that the celebration is in memory of the saving death of Christ, as the very words of institution declare, was frequently brought forward by him as a means to reassure anxious souls. The need of strengthening our faith should, according to him, impel us to receive the Sacrament.

He demands accordingly of others the same traditional faith is the Eucharist in which he found his own stay and support. While clinging to the literal int recetation of the words of the Bible, he, as we already know, is quite ready to appeal to the "dear Fathers" and to the whole of the Church's past, at least when thereby he hopes to make an impression. To such lengths does he go in the interests of the confirmation of faith to which he strives to attain by means of this indispensable Sacrament.

He overlooks the fact, however, that his view of the Supper, according to which its only purpose is to be a sign for the stimulating of saving faith, in reality undermines the doctrine of the Real Presence. True to his theory of the Sacrament and of faith he reduces the Supper to an outward sign destined to confirm the forgiveness of sins. One might ask: If it is merely a sign, is so sublime a mystery as the Real Presence at all called for? And, if it is a question of assurance, how can we be readered secure of our salvation by something which is so far removed above the senses as the belief in the Real Presence of Christ, or by an act which makes such great demands on human reason? Luther's theory requires a sign which should appeal to the senses and vividly remind the mind of the Redemption and thus awaken faith. This is scarcely the case in the Eucharist where Christ is invisibly present and only to be apprehended by "the Word," If bread and wine are merely to call forth a remembrance of Christ which isapires faith, then the Zwinghan doctrine of the Sacrament fulfils all that is required. Luther does not face this difficulty, but Protestants were not slow to urge it against him.

4 Above, p. 410.

A peculiarity of Luther's teaching on the Sacrament is to be found in his two theories of Impanation and Ubiquity. Impanation, viz. the opinion that the substance of the bread persists in the Sacrament and that Christ is present together with the bread, served him as a means to escape the Catholic doctrine of a change of substance (Transubstantiation). With the help of the theory of Ubiquity which affirmed the presence everywhere of the Body of Christ, he fancied he could extricate himself from certain difficulties raised by opponents of the Sacrament. The history of both opinions presents much that is instructive. Here, however, we shall consider only the second, vis. the ubiquity of Christ's Body.

8 K. Jager ("Luthers religions Interess an assess Lahre von der Realpracens." Gresses, 1909) assumings the wittings dating from the period previous to the Secrementaries controversy and rightly comes to the sureliment, first, that Luther had above all un ethical interest in segarding as he did the Secrement of the Alter as a mount of strongthening faith by making arrows the redorming death of Christ; seed rouly, that he hold fast to the Real Presence on the etroright of the traditional both of the Church without going any droper into its grounds. Furth in the Real Presence was, however, no autable means of attempt) oning the certainty of calvation, because the Presence there does not appeal to the surrous nor does at serve as a sign of the forgiveness of eace as Luther supposed. To postulate it primarily on the authority of the Church was to contradict the principles of Lutheranern P 27: According to Enther, by partaining of it we are to be e-aveced in a "peculiarly vivid and lively manner of God's Green," The partnering of these "signs" was, according to Lather, necessary for us, " because we use still living in our and our certainty of salvation is ever expended to attack, and it is useful or nutable bronum here the Greeo of God is offered to each man in a manner that appeals to the senses. Thus the securence among from sensule perception is to nerve to strengthen and support religious certainty of salvation." 4) This is the sole religious importance that can be attributed to the secremental Body and Blood of Christ " Nevertheless, " from that very point of vious of the subjects interest involved in the Suppor, which we have seen above to be Littler's main concern (p. 28) we are forced to deep the Real Processes." "What is to strongthen our faith in God's green must not itself be the object of faith, but, as is evident, a set force starif upon our mind by a higher cortainty, or to speak more correctly, by a cicarer certainty, such as attaches to A fact which in the hat instance itself calls or markets per receptions. for confirmation, and which in every instance is perceptible only to fact a cannot reasonably serve to support enother fact which is of the utmost importance to our life of futh."

The theory of the omnipresence of the Body of Christ which Luther reached together with his doctrine of the Supper, like his other theory of the faith of infants, shows plainly not only of how much his imagination was capable, but also what curious theses he could propound in all calmness and serenity. Thus we hear him asserting that the Redeemer, the Lord of Creation, is present, in His spiritualised Body, everywhere and penetrates all things! He is present bodily at the right hand of God according to the Scriptures; but the right hand of God is everywhere, hence also in the consecrated Bread and Wine lying on the altar; consequently the Body and Blood of Christ must be there too. To the question how this comes about, he replies: "It is not for us to know," nor does reason even understand how God can be in every creature.

Much more important is it, so he says, that we should learn to seise, grasp and appropriate this ever-present "For though Christ is everywhere present, He does not everywhere allow Himself to be sessed and laid hold of. . . . Why? Because it is one thing for God to be present and another for Him to be present to you. He is present to you then when He pledges His Word to it and binds Himself by it and says: Here you shall find Me. When you have His Word for it, then you can truly seize Him and say: Here I have Thee, as Thou hast said." In this way Christ assures us of His presence in the Sacrament. and invites us, so Luther teaches, to partake of Him in the Bread of the Supper. This, however, is practically to explain away the presence of Christ in the Bread (to which Luther adheres so firmly) and to dissolve it into a purely subjective apprehension. Nevertheless, at least according to certain passages, he was anxious to see the Sacrament adored and did not hesitate to do so himself.*

To the behef that Christ's Body is truly received in Communion he held fast, as already stated, till the end of his life.

Ibid., p. 151=69.
 Muthorius, "Tischredon," p. 341.

³ "Werke," Wein, ed., 23, p. 143; Erl. ed., 30, p. 65, in the writing "Das diese Wort Christi "Das at mem Lero etce.," noch fest etchen," 1527.

The report, that, in the days of extreme mental tension previous to his last journey to Eisleben, he abandoned the doctrine of the Real Presence, hitherto to passionately advocated, in order to concluste the Zwingleans or Melanchthousans, is a fable, put into reconstron by eider Protestant writers.\(^1\) In view of the proofs, met with up to the very sait, of his belief to the contrary, we may easily discuss also the doubtful account to be mentioned directly which seems to apack in favour of his having abandoned it.

Luther's "Kurta Bekentris" of September, 1844 sertainly was true to his old standpoint and showed that he wished " the fanatics and enemies of the Sacrament, Carletadt, "Zwingel," Chrolampadium, Stimkfield [Schwenkfeld and their disciples at Zarich, or wherever else they be, to be sternly condemned and arended." In his last armion at Watterberg on Jan. 17, 1846, he warned his hearest against reason, that " fair prostitute and devil a bride, and, indirectly, and against the Secrementarions and these who attacked his decirans of the burger. George Maker relates that when he was went, on Jan. 10, 1544, by Luther to the religious englerence at Enrichan his found weighlief on his door these words . " Our professors must be evapored as the Happer of the Lord"; Luther also admonsted him not to endeavour to conceal or pass over in mones belof in the Real Presence. On his jearney Lather and much the mens in the erroces he delivered at Hade and Laloben ; even in his last errown at Essisten we find the Secrementarions described as seducers of mankind and foss of the Gospel."

That Luther changed his opinion is the purport of a comfrunceation, which, after his death. Melanchthon is such to have made to A. R. Hardenberg, a frund of his. Hardenberg speaks of it is a decument in his own handwriting primitived in the Percuen manic pal archives. There he revtainly affirms that Melanchthon had told him how that Luther, before his last journey, had said to him; People have gone too for in the matter of the Supper; he himself had often thought of writing accrething so as to smooth things down and thus allow the Church again to be reunited; this, however, might have east doubts on his doctrine as a whole; he preferred therefore to commend the case to God , Meleculithus and the others might find it promible to do cometaing after his drath 4—Evident vist in our duty to understour to understand and explain this account, however grounced our suspictions may be. One recent Protestant writer has justly remarked: "There must be comething behind Hardenberg's testimony 'b; and another that it 'encapt be sumply set aside."*

J. Hainfester, in 1898, seems to have given the most hinly

IV. —3 K

² fee the passages of Buchholzer and Train, two Protestants, in Keetlin Economic J. p. 644.

We h. Let ed. 32 p. 207 Benelin-Kaworen, J. p. 616.

^{*} Cp., the reprise in Körtlin Kaweron.

Köstlin-Kawerna, 3, p. 616.
F Loofs, "DG," p. 643.

explanation of it. After Lather's death Amedorf complained betterly that the Wittenberg edition of Lather's German works. then in the press, had not preserved the real Lather undefied, he pointed out, that, is the second volume, Luther's violent sttack on the Sacramentarians had been omitted where (at the and of the work * Das diese Wort Christs Das int mein Leib, etco.," noch fest stehen," 1527) he had said that the devil with the help of Bucer and his denial of the Parrament had smeared his fifth " over Luther's books, that Bucer was a "sly, slippery, slimy devil"; where Luther had spoken of Bucer's "gosonous malice, murderous stabs and arch-scoundreldom," thanks to which he had "defiled, posioned and defamed " Luther's teaching, and where a protest was registered against the assertion that "to begin with," Philip too had taught the same as the Sacramentarians, via that there is "nothing but bread in the Lord's Supper ". It was known that these pages had been suppressed in the new edition at Luther's own hint. This was stated by George Rocer, Luther's former assistant, who supervised the correction. He said, " he did this with the knowledge and by the request and command of Lother, because M. Hocer, who had there been so severely handled as a notable enemy of the Secrement, had more been converted." Of any real conversion of Bucer there can be no question, but as he was then doing good work at Ratisbos in the interests of the new Evangel it may be that Luther-perhaps moved thereto by his Electer at the instance of the Landgrave of Hosse-consented to duplay such indulgence. This may well have formed the subject of the communication Hardenberg received from Melanchthon, only that the one or the other, or pussely both in the interests of the movement hastie to Lather's Sacramental teaching, distorted and exaggerated the facts of the case, and thus gave ross to the legend of Luther's change of views.

Support for it may also have been seen in the circumstance that Lather, in spite of Melanchthon a defection on the doctrina of the Sacrament, never broke off his relations with him. In his severe "Kuets Bekentnis" (1544) he forhore from attacking Melanchthon either openly or covertly. Even in 1545, in the Preface to his own Latin works, Lather bestowed his well known sulogy on Melanchthon's " Locs theologics "3. It has been pointed out chewhere that the services his friend rendered him had been and continued to be too important to above of Luther's breaking with him.4

Though Luther was unflinehing in his advocacy of the Presence of Christ together with his pet theories of Impana. tion and Ubiquity, yet he waged an implacable war on the Opp. Int. vnc., 2 1, p. 15. 4 Above, vol. ni., p. 340 ff.

N. kirchi. Zeitschr., S. p. 831 ff.; 10, p. 455 ff.
 Werke, Weim. ed., 23, p. 279 f.; Erl. ed., 30, p. 147 ff.; J. termeent man, am made the devil's scavenger, . . . There was really no need so to defame my beloved book behind my back,"

Sacrifice of the Mass. As, however, we have reserved this for later consideration we shall here only point out, that both his doctrine and his practice with regard to the Sacrament of the Altar suffered by his unhappy opposition to the Mass in which it is celebrated and offered, even more so than by the modifications he had already introduced into the older doctrine.

Invocation of the Saints.

Among those doctrines of the Church from which Luther cut himself admit only little by little and at the expense of a wrench, must be numbered those dealing with the invocation of the Saints and with Purgatory.

The grand and inspiring belief of the Church in the Communion of Saints, which weaves a close and common band between the living and those souls who have already passed into heaven and those, again, who are still undergoing purification, had at first taken deep root in Luther's mind. Later on, however, the foundations of this doctrine became more and more undermined, partly owing to his theories on the Church and the Mediatorship of Christ, partly and even more so by his ardent wish to strike a deadly blow at the practical Life of the Catholic Church and all that "Popish" worship had erected on this particular doctrine. Veneration of the Saints and intercession for the dead loomed very large among the religious practices dear to the Christian people, though, at that time, they were disfigured by abuses. Luther adroitly used the abuses as a lever for his work.

As late as 1519, in one of his sermons, he urged his hearers to call upon the angels and the Saints; just as on earth one Christian may pray for another and be asked for his prayers, so, as he justly remarks is it also with the Saints in heaven.\(^3\) In his Church-postils, however, he raises his voice to condemn the "awful idolatry" by which (so he thought) the "trust" which we should repeat on God alone was jut in the Saints.\(^3\) From that time he never tires of declaring that there was "no text or warrant in Scripture for the worship of the Saints.\(^3\) Pray for me.\(^3\) He required the Wittenberg Canons to crase from the liturgiant prayers all reference to the intercession of the saints, as mis-[&]quot;Werke," We-m. ed., 2, p. 696; Erl. ed., 21, p. 272. Köstlin, Luthers Theol., ".", pp. 253, 371.

 "Werke," Erl. ed., 71, p. 71 f.
 Cp. Köstlin, ibid., p. 372.

leading and likely to give offence; this, in spite of the fact that the hturgical prayers of the Church's earliest days loudly voice the opposite view. The "Sendbrieff von Delmetzschen" of 1530 gives even stronger expression to his abhorrence for all invocation of the Saints. There he says that the light of the Gospel was now so bright that no one could find any excuse for remaining in darkness.*

In his Schmalkaiden Articles the invocation of Saints has become one of the "abuses of Endchrist"; for "though the angels in heaven pray for us," so he explains, again reverting to the ancient teaching of the Church, "and also the Sainte on earth, and, perhaps, even those in heaven, yet it does not follow that we are to invoke the angels and the Sainte."1

Mary.

As long as he admitted the invocation of Saints, Luther assigned a prominent place to that of the Blessed Virgin. " She is to be invoked," he writes in 1521, " that God may give and do according to her will what we ask "4. After he had changed his mind concerning the saints, he was unwilling to allow this any longer.

Owing, however, to the after effects of his Catholic education, here particularly noticeable in him, we meet with many beautiful sayings of his in support of the worship of Mary, although as time went on he grew ever more hostile to it.

"You know," so he says in a sermon published in 1522, "that the honour paid to the Mother of God is so deeply implanted in the heart of man that we dishke to hear it spoken against, but would much rather it were fostered and encouraged."

"O Blessed Mother," he had already said, "O most worthy Virgen, be mindful of us and grant that the Lord may do great things in us also." Such were his words in 1516 in a sermon on the Feast of the Assumption.

In the same year, on the Feast of our Lady's Conception, he

¹ To the Troyest Canons and whole Wittenberg Chapter, Aug. 19, 1523, "Briefwechsel," 4 p. 212; "Quantus private affectus spiritualisters indulgenatum sit, tamen mainfestain et publicam religionem in his tolerare non neet propter scandalum ignorantium et infirmerum, qui relate file has adfaunt."

"Works," Wenn. ed., 30, 2, p. 632 ff.; Erl. ed., 65, p. 119 ff.
Cp. "Conf. Aug.," art. 21, and "Apol.," ad art. 21. Below, p. 501.

"Pars II art. 2, "Symbol Bücher," p. 305.

* Ibid., 7, pp. 575 45, p. 202. Exposition of the Magnificat.

* Ibid., 10, 3, p. 313 .53, p. 495. Chareh-postals, Sermon on Mary & Nativity.

* Ibid, 1, p. $79 = {}^{\circ}$ Opp lat var., 1, p. 118. Sermon on the Assumption, Kustan, Luthers Theo, 12, p. 86.

sycals of her name, which he says as derived from " stills maris," and extoh her as the one pure drop in the orean of the . Peaced perditions. 1 To his admission here that her convection was immaculate he was still true in $527, as has already been about ; after 1829, however, the passage containing this admission was expringed when the general in quantum was reprinted * In his home-postile he may of her conception t. " Mary the Mother was surely born of maint parents, and in one, on we were 't only expandion of the universal behal to the contrary and of his own previous statements he does not attempt."

Owing to his behel in the Divinity of the Son, Luther continued to call Many the "Mother of God " here later he shared the Catholic view that Mary by the evershedowing of the Holy found and at the night of the Savinar had been unset that by God as the switzerant of the great mystery of the incornation through har throne than 4. He was also turn in according the Vargouity of the Mother of God as expressed in the Apositiv Crest, Presertheless, according to his own confession, this appealed to him less than her " usfelsoul, and when praising her he prefers to dwell on the latter, i.e. on the kings a motherhood ! Mary was to him ever a Virgin, before, during and after childberth, and, in the last memors he decreased at hardress before his death, he inouts on this perpetual birginity, says she over remained a pure, charte mad," and presen her humilry, because, though a "most pure and most holy bargin," yet after the birth of her Sees, examinently to the Law, she came to the Temple to be purified. *

Lather's work on the Magraheat (1521), of which we have already spoken (p. 237, n. 1), marks a turning point. Athough much that it says of the greatams, dignity and virture of Mary in get well be queted, yet is contains a me currounly superfluens warnings, for trotance, not to book on Mary as a " he gotal goddone." In agete of any about which may possibly have imagical with her worship, the Catholic people were well able to distaggash between the repertation and confidence given to her and these arts of worsing which belong solely to God. Cathodroins aboved full play to the despest and warmest leelings towards the ideal of the purest of women, without in any way deteacting freig the enclosive rights of her Dissire You; on the contrary, desisting to the Mother tended only to merean the noneur paid to the Non.

His " Exposition of the Magnift-at " has frequently been taken as a proof of Lather's great picty. It indeed contains many good throughts, even meant from those relating to Mary, but an auga comparangra the author time his jen for a highly prejudiced viribiation of his new teachings on the state of grace.

It should also be been a pried that the printerestarted on the book just before the Diet of Worms, and that it was intended to Werke," Weins, ed., 1, p. 107; "Opp. lat. var.," 1, p. 150.

 Above, n. 236, n. 1.
 Werke," Erl ed., 63, p. 433.

Ideal., 104, p. 29 ff ; 37, p. 71. Kanthu, ibid., 2, p. 6 in 6 to about history 74, p. 278. * Ibid., 204 2 per $ # Ibid, 204 2 pp 440 512 1 Jose Ween at 7, pp. 560, 573 fc., Erl. ed., 4., pp. 24s. 2 0 f attract and recure the support of the future rulers of the Saxon Electorate. Luther was also engaged at that time on his exceedingly violent acreed against Catharinus, in which he attempts to reveal the Pope in his true character as Antichrist. When, after the Diet of Worms, he continued his work on the Magnificat he was certainly in no mood to compace a book of piety on Mary. The would was that the brook became to all intents and purposes a controvermal tract, which cannot be quoted as a proof of his prety or sevenity of mind during those struggles. Luther's Magnificat is as little a serious work of adification and piety as his exposition of certain of the Positio, which appeared almost amultaneously and was also directed " against the Pope and the doctrine of men."

In the " Prayer-book " which Lather prepared for the press he retained the " Hail Mary " together with the " Our Father " and the " I believe," but he cut it down to the angel's greeting as contained in the Bible, and taught that thereby honour was merely to be given God for the grace announced to Mary! He frequently prenched e.g. in 1523, on the wrong use of this prayer !

In the Augsburg Confession, Mclanchthon, when rejecting the invocation of the Sainte, made no exception in favour of Mary. Let in the "Applicate" of the Confession also compared by him. he save, that " Many prays for the Church," that she is " most worthy of the greatest honour" ("dignacing amplications Asserting "), but is not to be made equal to Christ, as the Catholica Lather did not merely represent the Catholics for making a goddess of Mary; he even ventured some remarks scarcely to the credit of the Mother of God , for a while, so he says, she had presented only a small measure of faith and God had cometimes bliowed her to waver; such statements were due to his idea that all Circulture, in order to preserve a firm faith in their hearts, must ever be waging buttle. On these statements, Eck, in his Homilica, was very severe.

An attitude heatile to all the Catholic veneration for Mary is expressed by Luther in a sermen in 1522 on the Feast of our Lady a Nativity, included in his church postile. It is true that we "owe honour to Mary," he says, rather frigidly, at the very beginning, "but we must take care that we honour her aright." He proceeds to explain that "we have gone too far in honouring her and esteem her more highly than we should " For in the first place we have thereby " disparaged " Christ, the Redeemer, and "by the profound honour paid to the Mother of God derogated from the honour and knowledge of Christ"; secondly, the honour due to our fellow-men and the love of the poor has thereby been forgotten. If it is a question of honouring anyone Köstlin-Kawerau, 1, p. 874 f.

^{*} Werke," Werm ed. 11 p. 59 f. On March 11 1523 * Midler Kelde - Scrub Hober * n. 2.7

Home de temp 1 Aug Voide - Lettl — Oop 2 tom 5 pars I); fol & on account of his holmous, " then we are just as hely as Mary and the other Harms, however great, provided we beserve in Christ." That she "has a greater grave," via a higher dignity as the McGer of God, " is not due to any meris of hers, but emply because we enamed all be Mothers of God; otherwise also is on the name level with us,"

Of the anthem "Sales Region," which is "sing throughout the world to the ringing of great hells," he mays, that it was a "great binaphenry against God, "for it terms Mary, the mother of mercy, our life, our sweetness and our hope. "The "Region Cords" is not much better, since it calls her Quren of Heaven." Way should her provens have so much value, he asks, so though an aware of the explanations given by so many occlematical writers, particularly by St. Hernard. "Your prayers, Uthrutans, are so dear to me as here. And why? Because if you believe that Christ lives in you so much as an her then you can help me as much as she."

In this discourse again he vestures on the enumny on the Catholic veneration of Mary, of which he was to make such frequent use later, it is equivalent to adoration, "To seek to make of Mary an idel, that we cannot and may not do. We will not have her as a mediator, but as an advocate [to this Luther always clung] we will giadly accept her, like the other Saints, But people have put her always all the choice of angels." Neither here not elsewhere does he attempt to prove her alleged adoration or the idelatry of the Catholice; when, a little further on, he lease her forth against the pilgranages made by common folia to churches and chapels of our Lady, he is straying from the subject and dealing with a practice of the faithful, quite harmless and wholesome in steelf, whatever always at may then have involved.

The veneration for the holy Mother of the Redeemer, that high ideal of humility and purity of heart, so devoid of the alightest trace of seminatry, springs from the soil of humility, charity and pure, unschieb leve. Luther a whole mental outlook was not too favourable to such necessary despirations. His moral character, as exhibited more particularly during the period after his stay at the Wartburg and previous to his marriage, scarcely harmonised with the delicate bossoms of the cultus, nor can we be surpressed, scoling at it psychologically, that the chief alteration in his views took place just at this time.

That host is metanet, shared by so many heretes in their star in towards the most holy of women, outweghed in his soul the vestiges of Catricles feeling he still retained. Itsides impelled him to blacken the honour which the people loved to pay to Many, this he strive to point as mere idolatry seeking uncrusingly to affect this stigms on Catholician. Controversy stiffed in him the impoles to that pious veneration which he himself had admitted to be so well-founded and so natural.

Werke," Weim. ed., 10, 3 p. 113 ff; Fel ed. 151, p. 495 f
 Ibid., p. 321 f. =499.
 Ibid., p. 325 = 501.

Purectors.

In the Schmalkalden Articles the olden doctrine of Purgatory was rejected by Luther as follows: Purgatory, "with all its pomp, worship and traffic, must be held to be nothing more than a mere phantom of the devil." born of " that dragon's tail " the Mass. 1

Although in this condemnation Luther's customary polemical exaggeration of abuses clearly plays a part, yet from his Indulgence Theses and "Resolutions" down to the sentence in the Articles of Schmalkalden the working of his mind can clearly be traced, expressed as it is, now in rejection on principle, and on theological or biblical grounds, now in opportunist and cynical attacks on the Church's ancient doctrine of Purgatory. The temporal penalties which, according to the traching of the Church, must be paid by the suffering souls notwithstanding their state of grace, found no place in Luther's new theory of a faith which covered over everything. According to the usual view venial sins also are forgiven in the next world, thanks to the purifying pains of Purgatory. But of vessal sins as distinct from grievous sins Luther refused to hear. He had nothing but evasive replies to the objection which presented itself of its own accord, viz. that mortals when they die often seem rine neither for heaven nor for hell."

At first Luther was content to modify merely the doctrine of Purgatory which is so deeply implanted in the consciousness of the Christian, by denying that it was capable of making satisfaction while nevertheless asserting his belief in the existence of a place of purgation (" mild) certusimum est, purgatorium eise"),* then he devoted himself to countering the many legends and popular tales of the appearance of ghosts, a comparatively easy task.* The Pope, he went on to say, had merely made Purgatory an article of faith in order to enrich himself and his followers

Muller-Kolde, ibid., p. 303.

F. K. Hane, "Hilb. dec prot, Polemik," Buch 2, Kapitel 6: " Mont. mortals are too good for hell, but assumely not good enough for heaven. We may as well openly admit that there is something not quite clear here in the Protestantism of the Reformation."

F "Werke," Weim ed. I p. 5.5; "Opp lat var," I, p. 177. Resolutions on the Indulgence Thomas, Thesis 15.

Worke, Wenn ed. 10 1 1 p. 585; Ket ed., 103, p. 354.

by Masses for the Dead, though in fact " it may be that only very few souls go there."

Later he preferred to think, that God had in reality told us practically nothing about the existence or non-existence of Purgatory, or of the condition of the Saints in heaven; the preachers would do well, he says, gradually to wean the people from their practices in this regard; they had merely to decline to discuss the question of the dead and of the Saints in beaven. He was indeed unwilling to sever the close ties, so dear to the Catholic, binding the faithful to the deceased members of his family and to the beloved patterns and heroes of former days, yet his writings do tend in that direction.

From 1522 onward he inclined strongly to the idea that those who passed away fell into a deep sleep, from which they would awaken only on the day of Judgment; those who had breathed their last in the faith of Christ would all. so he fancies, sleep as in Abraham's bosom; but since this depended on the "good pleasure of God," it was not forbidden " to pray for the dead "; the petition must, however, be cautiously worded, for instance, as follows: "I beseech Thee for this soul which may be alcoping or suffering ; if it be suffering, I implore Thee, if it be Thy Divine Will, to deliver it." After praying thus once or twice, then " let it be." In 1528 we still meet, in his writings, with similar concessions to the olden teaching and practice."

In 1530, however, his writing "Widderruff vom Fegefeur."2 made an end of all concessions: here he is compelled to combat the "shouting and boasting of the Papists," for the "lies and abominations of the sophists with regard to Purgatory " had passed all endurance. He now wants the sleep of the soul to be understood as a state of happy peace, and when it becomes a question of answering the Bible passage alleged by the Catholics, viz. 2 Machabees xii 45 f., where it is said of the offering made for the fallen, that it is "a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead that they may be loosed from sins," Luther simply strikes

Cp., tbid., Erl. ed., 13°, p. 2 ff.; 15°, p. 521 17°, p. 55.
 In the "Bokentnia" also, tbid., We in ed. 26, p. 508; in Erl. ed., 30, p. 370, prayer for the dead m left optional.

* Ibid., Ect. ed., 31, p. 184 ff out this book from the Canon of Senpture, as indeed he had done even previously; the Charch, so his curious argument ran, could not bestow more authority and force on a book than it possessed of itself, because the sacred books must themselves bear witness to their inspiration.

It would be superfluous to enumerate in detail the other points of theology on which he set himself to oppose the Catholic teaching he had himself in earlier days advocated, sometimes on excellent grounds. We know his exclamation: Were I to teach to-day everything that I formerly taught, particularly in the beginning, then "I should be obliged to worship the Pope." Moreover, not only were there contradictions due to his falling away from doctrines of the Church which he had formerly vindicated, but also many others resulting from his modification of his own views, or implied in his new opinions.

His views on indulgences, satisfaction, penance and contrition, original sin and predestination, on marriage, priestly ordination, spiritual jurisdiction and secular authority, on Councils and the Roman Primacy, have already been dealt with historically in what has gone before. Other points of doctrine will have to be discussed elsewhere in a different connection; for instance, the far-reaching question of the Church and her visibility and invisibility, and—what is of no less importance for a due appreciation of the man—the end of all and the devil.

One only point, on which indeed Luther opposed the doctrine and practice of the Church with all his heart and soul, must here be considered more closely.

6. Luther's Attack on the Sacrifics of the Mass

All Luther's new doctrines referred to above might be regarded in the light of attacks on the Church's teaching and practice. None of his theological views were put forward by him merely to be discussed in the calm domain of thought. They are always quickened by his hatred of the Church and the antichristian Papacy. This holds good in particular of his antagonism to the sacrificial character of the Mass.

By his violent assault on the Mass he robbed the churches and public worship of the Holy Sacrifice, and removed the very focus of Divine service in the Church.

Whereas to the Catholic Church the celebration of the Sacrament of the Altar was always a true sacrifice of praise, thanksgiving and atonement, which Christ, as the High Priest, offers to the Eternal Father through the instrumentality of a priest, according to Luther it is merely a memorial on the part of the congregation, which stimulates faith and gives a public testimony to God's glory.* In 1506 he characterised the struggle against the Mass as one vital to the new faith; he was very well aware how closely allied it was with the worship to which he himself had once been devoted; "Had any man twenty years ago tried to rob me of the Mass, I should have come to blows with him."

Sacrifice is the supreme and at the same time the most popular expression of the worship of God. "From the trising of the sun even to the going down," the Prophet Malachias had prophesied (i. 11), "my name is great among the Gentiles, and in every place there is sacrifice, and there is offered to my name a clean oblation," viz. the Eucharist. The common oblation throughout Christendom formed a sublime bond uniting all the Christian nations of the earth in one holy family. The words of Christ concerning the "Body that is given for you," and "Blood that is shed for you," were rightly regarded as proving both the institution of the common sacrifice and its atoning power.

² That a samples had been made of the Mass appeared to him "Idolatry and a shameful abuse," a "twofold impacty and abountation"; its abountation no tengue could express. "Werke," Westerd. 8, pp. 469, 493; Erl. ed., 28, pp. 38, 45 f.; 60, pp. 403 f., 396.

ad., 8, pp. 469, 493; Erl. ed., 28, pp. 38, 45 f.; 60, pp. 403 f., 396.

*Keetlin, "Lathers Theol.," 22, p. 243. There were, however, always some voices raised amongst Protestants to demand that the "Secrifice and Atonement" under some shape or form should be insisted an more than the sermon. The Pressure of Christ, as taught by Luther, although this Pressure did not involve a sacrifice, was made use of to oppose any further denuding of wirehip. "No longer is the Secrifice and the Atonement which takes place at the Altar to be the centre of Divine worship," Pastor E Strick wrote in 1964, in "Der alto Glaube," 1963-4. 5, col. 1255, "but, according to modern views, God is merely present in the listening congregation by virtue of the Word presched from the pulps. Hence the pupit becomes the central point, the after an accessory. To this we cannot agree. Without atonement we have no God; hence no alter either... and no pulpit."

^{*} Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 24: "Stante misse Lutherus est dominatus, ruente missa totum fundamentum papez corruit"

^{*} Ibid., p. 19. "nam sgo tote pectore illam adorabam." But ep below, p. 500, p. 2

Luther not only burst asunder the bond of unity, but also overthrew the alter of sacrifice. It is against the correct idea of Divine worship to deprive it of all sperifies, and to make its principal object consist in the edification and instruction of the congregation, as Luther decreed. Here again we see Luther's individualism and the stress he laid on the subjective side, even to the extent of robbing religion of the sacrifice of the Lamb, which had the misjortune to be independent of fortuitous picty. The very walls of his temples seemed to utter a chill protest against being given over to a worship so entirely at the mercy of the feelings of the visitor. Luther was against the abuses connected with the Mass, and so were all well-instructed Cathoacs. But the latter argued, that, in spite of the abuses, the Mass must be honoured as the sacrifice on which the spiritual life rests. To the many contradictions of which he was guilty Luther added a further one, vis. of advocating as a purer and higher worship, one that does not even come up to the true standard of worship. (See vol. v., xxix., 9).

Luther's deep-seated and almost instructive antipathy to the Sacrifice of the Mass affords us, in its various phases, a good insight into his plan of campaign. On so other point does his hate flame forth so luridly, nowhere else is he so defiant, so contemptious and so noisy—save perhaps when attacking Popery—as when assailing the Sacrifice of the Mass, that main bulwark of the Papsey. One thing is certain; of all the religious practices sacred to Catholics none was branded by him with such hideous and common abuse as this, the sublimest mystery of faith and of Divine Love.

First Attacks. " On the Abommation of the Silent Mass."

In spite of Luther's assurance given above of his former high regard for the Mass, he must quite early have grown averse to it, probably at the time when his seal in the religious life first began to flag.

Even in 1516 we learn from his correspondence that he rarely found time for its celebration or for the recitation of the Canonical Hours.³ At a much later date he lets fall the remark, that he had never liked saying Mass.⁶ In view of his disturbed state of soul we can readily credit what he mays, viz. that, in the monastery Gabriel Biel's book on the 1 Above, vol. i., p. 275.

* Ibid., p. 276.

Mass, in which the dignity of the Holy Sacrifice is extolled with the voices of antiquity, had often made his heart bleed.1 It is rather curious, that, according to his own account, it was on the occasion of his first Mass after ordination that his morbid state of fear showed itself strongly for the first time.* No less remarkable is it that his most extravagant self-reproaches for his past life had reference to his saying Mass. He tells us how, even long after his apostasy, he had often been brought to the verge of despair by the recollection. of the terrible an of saying Mass whereby he had at one time openly defied and offended God. He morbidly permades himself that he had been guilty of the most frightful idolatry; that, as a priest and monk, he had performed the most eriminal of actions, one subversive of all religion, in spite of his having done so in ignorance and in perfect good. faith.

In his sermors on the Commandments, published in 1818, we still find a tribute to the Sacrifice of the Mass as Catholica understood it. * But in his "Sermon von dem hochwirdigen Sacrament des bevilgen waren Leychnams Christi." of 1518. he is curiously reticent concerning the nature of the Mass, whilst expressly recommending and praising the communion. of the congregation—under both kinds—as the work of that faith "wherein strength lies."

The first open attack on the Holy Sacrifice was made in his "Sermon von dem newen Testament das ist von der heyligen Messe" (1520). The latter appeared almost mmultaneously with his "An den christlichen Adel" and prepared the way for his subversive treatment of the Mass in his "De captivitate babylonica." In the Sermon he Leuterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 18.

 Cp. vol. i., p. 15 f and, besites the references given there, a. passage from George Rever a MS of the Table Talk, given by E. Kroker, "Archiv für RG.," 5, 1904, p. 354, where Luther, in a peroxysm of terror at the words of the Canon." offers fibs Dec wise micros [sic]," asys: Die perfesteftebam, ut ab altari discedere contabam, et fectioem, nim ma retributive news praceptor, quia coquari. What is Ha with Whom you are speaking ? From that time forward I said Mass with terror, and I arn thankful to God that He has released me from it."

^{*} On a selemm occasion, at the conclusion of his " Vom Abendmal Christi Bekentus," in 1528, he has it, that, though he had " spent has youth unmably," yet his having been a moak and his having said. Name had been his greatest sins. See below, p. 524.

Werke, "Welm. od., 1, p. 443 ff.; "Opp. lat. exeg.," 12, pp. 81, 63 sen declared that it was " almost the worst abuse." that in the older Church the Eucharistic celebration had been turned into a sacrifice to be offered to God. Statements such as these predominate in the virulent chapter devoted to the Mass in the " De captivitate babylonice": Christ's secrifice on the cross had been made out to be insufficient and the Sacrifice of the Mass set up in its place; the Supper was the Lord's work for us, but, by ascribing a sacrificial value to the Mass, it becomes a work of man for God, whereby man hopes to please God.

¹ lbel , 2, p. 735 ff. , Erl ed , 27, p. 25 ff.

The close ties connecting the Sacrifice of the Mass with both the Church's ancient traditions and the institution of Christ are here ruthlessly torn asunder. A lund and grossly exaggerated account of the abuses which had arisen in connection with the money-offerings for Masses served to stimulate the struggle, essentials faring as badly as what was merely accidental.

At the Wartburg the "Spirit" of the place further excited Luther's hatred of the Mass. He poked fun at the " Mass-priest" who served the stronghold and wrote to Melanchthon: "Never to all eternity shall I say another Low Mass." 4 This he says in the same letter which witnesses to his inner contest with the monastic yows, and in which we find the sentence: "Be a singer and an boldly but believe more boldly still." At the time of his spiritual haptism in the Warthurg he also wrote both his " De abroganda misea " and his "De votis monasticis." The former he published in 1522, also in a German version entitled "Vom Missbrauch dee Messen. 11

This was the bugle-call to the struggle he immediately commenced at Wittenberg against the continued celebration of Mass by the Catholic clergy in the Castle and Collegiate churches of the town. We have already treated of the phases of that campaign in which his impetuosity and intolerance manifested itself in all its nakedness.4 From the inglorious combat, thanks to the help of the mob, he was to come forth victorious. On Christmas Day, 1524, for the first time, there was no Mass, and in the following year Justus Jones wrote of the completion of the work: "On the ^{*} Ibid., 6, р. 364 п = 27, р. 155 п.

Aug. 1, 15, 1, 'Briefwechsel.' 3, p. 208.
 Above, vol. ar., p. 104 ff. ... Vol. ii., pp. 88 f., 327 ff.

Saturday after the Feast of St. Matthew the Apostle and Evangelist, the whole Pope . . . was flung out of All Saints' church at Wittenberg, together with the stoles, albs, etc.; the olden ceremonies were replaced by pious ones such as accord with Sempture."

Luther was convinced that the "whole Pope" could not be destroyed throughout the world save by the abolition everywhere of the Mass. "When once the Mass has been put away," he declares in 1522, in his screed against Henry VIII., "then I shall think I have overthrown the Pope completely."

In this writing his consciousness of his mission and his defiant insistence on the new teaching were largely directed against that palladium of the old Church: "Through me Christ has begun to reveal the abomination standing in the Holy Place" (Dn. ix. 27). It is in denying the sacrificial character of the Mass that he uses those odd words of bravado: "Here I stand, here I sit, here I remain, here I defy with contempt the whole assembly of the Papists," etc."

The last act in his warfare on the Mass at the Collegiate church of Wittenberg had been anticipated by Luther's stormy sermon against the Canon of the Mass (Nov. 27, 1524).⁴ This identical sermon, taken down by his pupil George Rerer, formed the groundwork of the writing he published in 1525, "You down Grewel der Stillmesse so man den Canon nennet."

Here he proceeds on the curious assumption, only to be explained by his perverted enthusiasm, that the mere bringing to light of the Canon (i.e. of the principal part of the Mass, which incloses the Consecration and which the priest reads in allone) will suffice to bring about the fell of the whole Euch aristic ritual. It is passionate, cymical conmentary which he appended to the translation, was, however, far more effective.

The author second not in the least to reduce that the Canon of the Mice is one of the most ancient and most authentic schoes of the early Western Church. It contains subline religious ideas conclud in the simple yet impressive language of the remotest ages of the Church when she was still in touch with elassical

⁴ To Spalatin, Sep. 23, 1525. Cp. ⁴ Briefwechsel des Jonas,⁷ 1, p. 93.

See vol. it, p. 320.

On Rocce's work and its connection with the writing mentioned, see Wenn, et., 18, p. 22 ff.

culture. 1 Yet Lather's opinion is that 1 "It must have been composed by some unlettered monk."

He concludes the he-skirt with a specimen of his mont language: " Nee, there you have heard the holy, exent Mass and now know what it is, that you may stand agreet at it and cross yourself is through you may the decid as large as life ". He exharts the rander to trank God, that ' much an abandmation has been brought to hgret," and "that the great whose of Babylon has been waponed."

At the same time he tells the secular authorities that it is their bounded query to interfere " by present of the law " against such deternation of the name of God , "for when an impatent miral openly blue better field in the street, or curses and swears, and the dothernies present it, they become in the eight of God partners in his wrekedness. And if in a me regions it is forbidden to cures or swear, much more just were it that the scrular seeds abould here tin nomething to prevent and to punish, because such baseborning and defaring in the Mass is quite as jurile and as open as when a kneed blosphemes in the a rest. If one is purishable, the other is surely no less so,""

Thus Lather a attacks on the Mean in a fatal way become one of the gradianada on which the theory of freedom of convenience and worship which he had just forth at the elementerment suffered the wreck. 4. Even in the question of the Mass at Wittenberg by had formerly massed, in opposition to Cartwadt a violent proceedings, that no renginus computation should be exercised; thin he did, for instance, in the sermons he preached against Carlstadt a undertaking and particularly in that on Low Massan,* where he declared that faith cannot he held captave or bound, that each one must see for himse! what is right or frong and is not emply to fall in this "general operiors or to yield to compuls on." His words were an honourable declaration in favour of freadom of conscience. And now, in his warfare against his finition, corrective of the Mam, not theoretically only but in practice too (for pendes Wittenberg, there was also Altenburg and Erfurs)* he peaced the Mass, the most moved centre of the Church a womanp, on a level with christian deeds and invited the Matherius, "Tischweies," p. 119, in 1540.

Car gle

¹ F Probet, "Die Liturgie der drei eesten Jahrh.," 1870, p. 349 fl. P. Drows, " Zur Entstehungsgeseh, des Karjons der röm, Messe," 1902, p. 26 S. F. X. Funn, * C -er core Kancer * Heat James * 24, 1903). pp. 42 ff., 243 ff. (agraphet I come). A. Haussatark, " Lating a comana e littargia nell'impresso, Cray na del access cincas francares. Hist Jahrta, 2. 1986 p. 1.9, chand 21 1980 p. 593 P. Drows, "Untermelanger, there die sog. klementansche Laterges," 1 Th., 1907 (see " Mast, Jahrh.," #8, 1907, p. 166). M. Gihr, " Das hl. Messopfor " 14, 1907

³ ⁶⁶ Warko, ¹¹ Worm od., 10, p. 36; Rel, ed., 20, p. 132 f.

Cp. vol. ii., p. 341. Köstha, "Lutnora Theol.," 1*, p. 33$. "Werke," Erl. ed., 2$, pp. 216 c., 2, 8 ff. 4 Vol. 14, pp. 326 ft , 336 ft magistrates to treat it as a secretege, since it was the duty of authority "to check all outbreaks of wickedness."

When Johann Eck took up his pen to refute Luther's "Von dem Grewel der Stillmesse" he felt it almost superfluous to prove how unfounded the latter's assertions were, that, by the sacrifice of the Mass, Catholics "denied in deed and in their heart that Christ had blotted out sin "by His Sacrifice on Golgotha, or that they maintained, that, not the merits of Christ, but rather "our works, must effect this." He enters at greater length into the theological proofs of the truly sacrificial character of the consecration and of the correctness and value of the Canon, supplementing the biblical passages on the Sacrifice of the New Covenant by the clear and definite witness of tradition.

He and his Catholic readers were, however, quite prepared to find Luther refusing even to listen to such proofs taken from tradition. "Ah, bah, tradition this way, tradition that!" he had already ened, with regard to this very question, when striving to shake himself free of the fetters of the Church's doctrine.

Eck, however, also attacked Luther from another point. Luther had placed in the very forefront of his writing the assertion, that he had never advised the people to have recourse to violent measures, whether with regard to the Mass or the Catholic worship generally, or invited them to revolt; in the preface Eck accordingly promises to take him to task both concerning the Canon and for his responsibility in the rising. "I shall, please God, prove Luther a har on both counts." He convicts him of inciting to revolt on the strength of "five proofs" taken from various works of his.

The pecuniary aspect of the Mass supposed Luther and the preachers with an effective means of exciting the people which they were not slow to seize. The abuses, real or apparent, of the system of Mass-supends, were worked to their utmost by the demagogues.

Auf Luthers Greuel wider die heisige Stillman Antwort," 1926.
 IV.—2 L

^{*} After Kostlin (66d., p. 340), who quotes from "Works," Erl. ed., 22, p. 49 (Write: ed., 8, p. 58, f.), Luther a passage against the Princes, who allow everything to slide: they ought to draw the sword, not indeed to "put the priests to death," but to "forbid by word and their put down by force whatever they do that is over or against the Guspel."

Werks," Weim. ed., 18, p. 29; Erl. ed., 29, p. 124.

^{*} Ibid., p. 33-129.

In Lather's extravagant language the flacustics of the Mass is simply made to appear a rich field for valger greed of gain, discovered and exploited by the Papeirs because it filled their poriots. The amount brought in by Masses for the Dead was chiefly to blame for the spread of the Mass. "This invention [Masses for the Dead] has been worth money to them," he cross, "so that they need not say Mass for nothing." "At All Saints", here at Wattenberg, the money is goddensy thrown away [by foundation-Masses, namual communications, etc.], the three Mass-priests there, "three pipe or paunches," reference it, "in the bouse of infanty emply because they worship money."

Many of the apostles of the new faith preached in the same strum as Luther. Others, as Stephen Agricula for instance states he clid, were content to ecourge "the great superstation and hindrance to the true honour of God," i.e. the abuses. Agricola, if we may trust him, " was south to ore Masses for the drad and for money, as this should be done out of pure charity "1. When, Inter, Flacus Illyricus made am.lar charges against the Catholicu on the pretext of the alms given for Mosses, the Dominican, Johann Pabri, replied : "What do you are among do gratin f People one never give enough for your preaching, your peolinsinging, your Supper, etc., so that yearly a very large sum has to be speat on your support Why then do you abuse the poor priests who take payment for their work and unfundly twit them for enying Mass solely for money t. What namer would you make were I to any : You too, Digricus, preach for the sake of money T "4

The charges of self-seeking and avance had, however, in some places so strong an effect as to lead to popular rungs against the celebration of Mass. This recalls the account given by Krasmus of the ready success he had noticed attended the addresses of the preachest: "The Mass has been abolished," he writes, "but what more hely thing has been are as its place?. Their charches I have never entered. I have occurrenally seen those who instead to their sermions come out like men powered, with anger and fury writ large upon their faces. . They walked his warmors who have just been haranged by their general. When have their securous ever produced penance and contestion? Do they not devote most of their time to about of the clergy and their I yes? . . Are runge rure amongst them avangeleads? And do they not resurt to violence on the slightest provocation?

¹ "Worke" Weim, ed., 10, p. 31; Erk ed., 19, p. 120.

P. Cp. Keetlin-Kawersu, I, p. 627.

⁶ Cp. "Hist. Johrb.," 12, 1893, p. 776, where M. Paulos quotes for the first term a memorandum (1522) of Johann Staupets against Stephen Agreeda, which corroborates his statement over trivial before (shell p. 389.71), that Statepts was quite Catholic in his views on matters of faith.

⁴ "Antwort auf dus . . . Geschweis M. Floroi Illyris," 1558, p. 121 f. Quoted by Paulus, ibid., p. 714.

b  Opp.,  10, col. 1578 seq. Döllinger,  Die Reformation,  1, p. 13 f.

THE SACRIFICE OF THE MASS 515

The peaceable union of Christians before the Altar of Sacrifice in the "Mystery of Faith" had made way for warfare. The absence of the sacrifice avenged itself, however, in the Churches given over to the new religion by the dreamness and utter desolation of the sacred buildings once so full of life; not to mention the dreadful controversies, the bare "ministry of the Word" and the one sided effort to make of the Supper simply a source of edification and increase of faith, could not suffice to attract the multitude to the Eucharistic celebration. The great sacrifice, which by its own infinite worth and quite independently of its power to edify, glorifies God in His Temple, and so powerfully stimulates the faithful to unite their offering with the sacramental oblation, had been torn from the midst of the congregation.

If we seek here for the connecting link between Luther's bitter hostility to the Mass and his system as a whole, we shall find, that, granted the doctrine of the imputation of the ments of Christ by faith alone, the Euchanstic Sacrifice had no real place left. Luther said in 1840: "Where the 'locur' ['instificationis'] is rightly taught and stands, there can be nothing evil; for the antecedens, 'faith alone justifies,' spells the fall of the Mass," etc.'

In the new faith everything turned on the saving and the pacification of the sinner by virtue of a sort of amnesty furnished by the merits of Christ's death on the cross. Faith alone secures all the fulness of the Redeemer's work. of satisfaction: no ordinance of Christ, sacrament, sacrifice or priesthood can assist in the work of clothing the soul with the mantle of these Divine ments; anything of the sort would only diminish the dignity and the efficacy of the confidence of faith. Only what promotes the personal faith which saves-that master-key to the forgiveness, or better, to the cloaking of sin-is here admitted, but no work, no "opus operatum" of Christ's institution, which, through secrament and secrifice, imparts grace to the faithful Christian who is duly prepared to seek salvation; on the contrary, according to Luther, such institutions, which the ancient Church looked upon as sacred, only detract from the merits of Christ.

Google

¹ Mathesius, "Tischreden," p. 236

And since, in his view, every Christian by his faith is a priest, the hierarchy falls, and thus sacrifice too, at least as the prerogative of a special sacerdotal class, also ceases to exist.

Hence the warfare on behalf of the Evangel of faith alone and against accordatalism, naturally, and of necessity, led to the warfare against the Mass. This particular combat, in which (as in the attack on the Church's visible head, visible Pope) Luther's animoutly against the Catholics reached its cuminating point, necessarily occupied a place in the forefront, because the Mass, which united the congregation before the alter, was the most public and most tangible expression of Catholic life and the one most frequently seen.

Luther's theological perversions of the Church's doctrine of the sucrifice of the Masa, in the above works and elsewhere, are all the more astonishing, seeing that Gabriel Birl, the theologian, with whom he was in well acquainted and whose "Speri canonia misaz expositio" he had studied with keen interest, had, in his exposition of the ancient doctrine of the Mass, forestalled these very misrepresentations, almost as though he had actually foreseen them.\ The respected Tubingen University-Professor, in this explanation of the Mass, which appeared in 1488, was frequently reprinted, and was much used by both parish elergy and preachers, insists, in close unison with the past, that there was but one great and atoning sacrifice of the cross, and that the sacrifice of the Mass did not in the least detract from it but rather applied it to the individual believer. points out with great emphasis the uniquely sublime character of the sacrifice on Calvary ("union oblatio et perfectionimum socriferum"), in its fourfold aspect as a sacrifice of praise, thanksgiving, petition and atonement, In support of this he quotes a number of passages from the "By it [the sacrifice on the cross] our sins are blotted out (Ronwas iv.). Through it we have found grace whereby we are saved (Hebrews v.): for, being consummated

I For this excellent work, which for the most part reproduces the lectures of Magnier Egeling Bosler, see A. Frans, "Die Mose ins deutschen MA.," Freiburg, 1902, pp. 542-554. The comprehensive "Aspositio," comprising 51 "nignatures," consists of 89 Lectures addressed to the clergy. Franz characterises it as "a work which, by its theological thoroughwest and its inselectably meetical views, was exiculated to promote learning amongst the clergy and render thoroughwest worthy of exercising their greatest and finest privilege" (p. 554).

THE SACRIFICE OF THE MASS 517

by suffering. He (Christ) became to all who obey Him the cause of eternal life. By the one oblation of the cross He hath for ever perfected them that are sanctified (Hebrews z.)," etc. " If you seek the blotting out of sins, behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world; if you seek thanksgiving, Christ gives thanks to the Father; If you seek for deliverance from evil, He heals and sets us free." In several passages he dwells in detail on the idea of the saving Lamb of God, once in connection with the three-repeated Agains Dei of the Mass.

But, a comparatively short time after, another was to come, who would assert that the world had long ago lost the Lamb of God, and who presumed to take upon himself the task of pointing Him out anew to all men and of making Him profitable to souls.

In unison with Fathers and theologians, Biel sums up the mutual relations between the Sacrifice of the Mass and the Sacrifice on the Cross in the words. "Although Christ was once only offered visibly in the flesh, yet He is daily offered concealed under the appearances of bread and wine, though painlessly, for the Sacrifice of the Mass is the representation and menional of the menifice consummated on the Cross and produces the same effects."

Lectio 85, P

Ib d. . "Quarters autem serrel oblatus est Christius su aperta carrier effigie, offertur ninifomnus quotidie in alteri velatus," etc. Of the conserves witnesses to the ancient belief of the Church, Joh. Ernest Grahe notes in his Oxford edition of Irenaus (1702) with regard to a statement of his on this subject (4 c. 17, al. 33); "What Irris us here tenches of the escribual character of the Euchanst, Ignatius and Justin taught before him, and Tertulian and Cyprian after. It is clearly veuched for in Clement of Rome's Epistic to the Corinthians." There is no doubt that Irenaus and the other Fathers, both these who had seen the Apostles, as well as their immediate successors, regarded the Euchanist in the Sacrifice of the New Law, and . . . proscuted at the alter the consecrated characte of Bread and Wine to God the Father in order to figure the bloody Secretce which He Humarif had effered on the erom in His flesh and Blood, and in order to obtain the fruits of His death for all for whom it was offered." Gregory the Great taught with antiquity (Hom. 37 in Evang. c, ?): " Quotice et (Lie) hostiam sum passeours afferenus, tones nobis ad absolutionem nostrom passionem siliam reparamies," and in his Dialogues, which contributed greatly to the high outcom of Masons for the dead (we are here considering the doctrine, not the legenda, he mays of the burrilice of the Mass: " Has singulariter victims ab aterno interitu anunam ealest, ques illem mobis mortem Unigenité per mysterium reporat. . . . Pro nobse sterum on hoc osysterso enerm oblictionia cosmolutur. [1] Dinl., 4, 48; cf. 59). The well known Lutheren theologian Mortin Chemiata

When describing more minutely its efficacy for the obtaining of grace and forgiveness of sins he dwells on the thought, that it has no quasi-magical effect, but acts " according to man's preparation and capacity," so that the Holy Saerifice does not by any means blot out un if man's heart is still turned away from God: to souls that show themselves well-disposed it brings contrition and sorrow for sin and finally forgiveness.1 Unlike Baptism and Penance, It does not reconcile the soul with God directly, but only indirectly, by arousing the spirit of penance which leads to the wholesome use of the sacraments and appeares the anger of the Heavenly Father by the offering of His Son, and prevents Ham withdrawing the help of His grace. Biel elucidates the idea of sacrifice, deals with the figurative sacrifices of the Old Testament, which found their fulfilment in the clean oblation (Mai. i. 10 f.) to be offered from the rising of the san even to the going down, with the twofold efficacy of the Mass ("ez opere operato" and "ez opere operante") and many other points which Luther unjustly attacks; with the lawfulness of private Masses, with or without any Communion of the faithful, with the advantage of Masses for the souls of the faithful departed, with Massstipends! Which he defends against the charge of amony, and with the practice of repeating silently certain portions of the Mass, an uncient usage for which he gives the reasons.4

" On the Corner-Mass " Continuation of the Conflict.

In his war against the Mass Luther was never to yield an inch. His " Von ders Grewel der Stillmesse " was followed wrote in his "Examen concilis Tridentias" (1565-1573), that it could not be desired that the Fathers, when speaking of the relebration of the Supper, make use of expressions descriptive of Sacrifice, such as "secrificiam," "simmolate," "solutie," "hostia," "sectione," "offerre," "secrificare," "simmolate," (t. 2, p. 782). Cp. J. Dollinger, "Die Lehre von der Eucharistie in den ersten drei Jahrh.," 1826. J. A. Möhler, "Symbolik," [] 34 and 35.

1 Lectio S5, under L., " S1 can disposite invested, sia graham

* Ibut, L. 17 (b.). Master Egeling discusses this even more in detail, Francisco (ibid., p. 548), speaking of legeling's M8., of which he makes use. "The remarkable length at which he undicates the Church a rule that the Canon be recited alently is not without against once. It would appear that this gave offence to the people." Luther sensed upon this popular prejudice as a weapon in his war on the Mass.

by fresh pronouncements and writings which bear witness to the intensity of his hatred.

The occasion for another lengthy writing against the Mass and the hierarchy seems to have been furnished in 1588 by the religious conditions in the province of Anhalt, where the Princes, under pressure from their Catholic neighbours, had begun to tolerate the former worship and the saying of Mass. In Dec of that year Luther published his booklet "Von der Winckelmesse und Pfaffen Weibe."

It was designed primarily as a protest against "the ecclesiastical jurisdiction and Ordination," i.e. against the hierarchy and presthood, and broadly histed to the "bishops and priests" that their Order was doomed to destruction. At the Diet of Augsburg he declared his followers had " very humbly informed the Pope and the bishops, that we had no wish foreibly to infringe on their rights and authority in ecclesiostical matters, but that, so long as they did not compel us to any unchristian doctrines, we were quite ready to be ordained and governed by them, and even to assist them in their administration," but his overtures having been rejected, nothing remained for him but to await the end of the priesthood when God should " in good time " so dispose " God is wonderful"; He had " overthrown by His word " so much " papestical Mammonservice and idolatry "; "He would also be able to wipe away. the ranged Chresam," i.e. to make an end of the bishops and priests in whose ordination Chrism was used.* Towards the end of the tract he returns to the attack on priestly ordination. He is determined "again to adjudge and commit to the Churches the call, or true ordination and consecration to the office of pastor. The members of the Church must have the "right and authority to appoint people to the office," and to entrust it to simple believers of blameless lives, even "without Chrism or butter, grease or lard."3

The greater portion of the writing is, however, devoted to the "Corner-Mass," i.e. the Mass generally, which according to the Catholic doctrine is equally valid whether celebrated by the priest alone in a lonely chapel or smid a <sup>Werke," Erl. ed., 31, p. 308 ff. New edition by G. Kaworau in Neudrucke deutscher Literaturwerke," No. 50. Halle, 1883.

Worke," ibid., p. 308.
Ibid., p. 374 f.</sup> concourse of faithful who unite their prayers with his and communicate. For reasons readily understood, Luther profess to use the contemptuous term " Corner-Mass."

To wants the end he howelf sums up the thoughts on the Most which he has just submitted . !-

rie had the best ge unde for "being affrighted," that he and others "had once and the Corner Main as devoutly." After the reasons he had advanced, everyone, particularly the Papeta to-day, must be driver to desput at the frightful idelatry of the Mass; yet they "unatonly persent in their atomination." They persent Christ's ordinance, my their Main not merely in devolvatione to God, but also bisophermously and without any command, give the aggregate to rin one but keep it for themselves alone, and, to make matters were, are not even certain whether they are receiving merely brand and who or the Body and Blood of Christ, because they do not follow Christ's ordinance."

Here he plainly enough questions the presence of Christ under the consecrated elements in the "Corner-Mass" and has thus made a notable stude forward in his hostility.

"Nor can anyone be certain," so be continued his summing up, "whether they (the pricets, in the Canon of the Mais) pronounce the World [of institution] or not; hence me one is bound to believe their essent action. Norther do they preach to anyone, though Christ communical at." In his opinion it was secretial both that the words of institution should be spoken aloud, in order to star thate faith, and that the service should include the prinching of the Word—minor matters, which, however, because of the greatest importance to him when once he had reduced it all to the status of a mere ceremonial of edification.

He hold y concludes. "It is note supersible that they (the Popush sayers of Masses' can be right in their faith." For, as already demonstrated, "one and the same man could not believe neight and yet knowingly superigament the Word of God. Hence they can neither pray, nor after thanks in such a way as to be acceptable to God. And, finally, over and above these about mattern and critical, they actually dare to offer to God that increasions (if what is disgrared by so much biaspherry and above tration can be called a sarrageout) and to barter and will it to other Christians for money."

The book on the "Winekelmesse" is celebrated for the disputation between Luther and the devil which it describes. The devil icls forth the proofs against the Mass with marve less skill and, by his representes, drives the quandam mank into desperate straits. Here Luther is describing the deep remove of conscience which he will have it he had to endure on account of his Masses. He is, however, merely using a literary artifice when he introduces the devil as the speaker, of thu there will be more to say later. Here, in addition to a letter, which so far has received but little attention, in which he himself furnishes the key to the form in which he casts his argument, we may mention the fact that Luther's first draft of his writing on the " Winckelmesse," which has recently been examined, gives a portion of the devil's arguments against the Mass and without any reference to the devil, as the author's own; only later on was the devil made the apokesman for Luther's ideas." We can see that it was only as the work proceeded that there occurred to Luther the happy thought of making the devil himself speak, not so much to reveal to the world the worthlessness of the Mass, as to east if possible poor Luther into despair, because of his former Mass sayings, and to reveal the utter perversity of the Paputs, who, far from being in despair, actually boasted of the Mass.

Luther expected great things from his rathless attack and from the scene in which the devil appears. It would be, so he fancied, a "test of the wisdom and power of the Papacy." His friend Jonas, in a letter of Oct. 26, 1588, speaking of the yet unpublished "Winekelmesse," calls it a real "battering-ram" to be used against the Papacy; it was long since the Professor had been heard speaking in such a way of the Mass, the Pope and the priests. Those

¹ Vol. v., xxxi., 4.

To Nic. Hammant at Deman, Doc. 17, 1633, "Brofwechael" 9, p. 263, where he calls the unting a "non-general histing," which challenged the Papers to one whether they had an answer ready to give the devil when lying on their death-hede

A. Freying in Kutimene, "Die handschrift! Therisdering von Werken Littlere "1907, pp. 16 and 11, where in Littler's rough notes the words that court "primum argumentum disholt". Freying, however, is of opinion, that "Luther's account of the disputation with the devil certainly [1] had its origin in the Reformer's termenting mental experiences, and that he had been actually assailed by accurang thoughts concerning his former share in the absonvantion of private Masses." Acetha Kawersu, 2, p. 306, speaking of the disputation, also refers to the "anguish of soul." which everwhelmed him "owing to his own former share in so great a crime as he now more fully recognised it to be." Cp. our vol. v., xxxii.

⁴ In the letter to Hausmann (above, n. 2) "Ligheron has libella fenture paperties representant et potentiem."

To Spaintin, only an extract extant. See Jonas a "Briefwochiel," p. 201; "Lutherna scribit tillianmum, fortissimum arietem, quaquatetur, at ferreira murus, papatus."

of the preachers who were fallen priests rejoiced at the advice they found in the book for the quieting of their consciences when tempted by the devil, and at its hint that they should rub their anointed hands with soap and lye the better to obliterate the mark of the Beast.

The writing was translated by Jonas into Latin, but his rendering was a very free and rhetorical one.

The interest it aroused was increased by the negative attitude which Luther seemed to assume towards the Real Presence. To many of his followers Luther seemed to come to an opinion not far removed from the Zwinglian denial of the Presence. Luther learned that Prince Johann of Anhalt and others had expressed their annuety lest the booklet " should be understood as though I agreed with the fanaties and enemies of the Sacrament." Hence he at once issued a fresh writing entitled: "A Letter of D. Mart. Luther to a good friend concerning his book on the Corner-Masses" (1584).¹

To attack the Sacrament and the Real Presence was, he there declared, far from his thoughts. I shall prove "that I do not hold, nor ever shall hold to all eternity, with the wrong doctune of the focs of the Sacrament-or to speak quite plainly-with that of Carlstadt, Zwingli and their followers."2 But by this he stood: "Whoever, like the Papists, did not celebrate the Sacrament according to the ordinance of Christ, had no right to say Christ was there ": "a counterfeit florin, struck contrary to the King's order, can never be a good one." a " May God bestow on all pious Christians such a mind, that, when they hear the Mass spoken of, they quake with fear and cross themselves as they would at the aight of some abomination of the devil."4

Johann Cochleus at once replied to the "Winckelmesse" with an appeal to the correctness of ecclesiastical tradition. In the same year he published Innocent the Third's " De sacro altaris mysterio" and Isidore of Sevilla's " De eccleniasticus officias." These venerable witnesses of Christian antiquity had, he declared, " a better claim to be believed than Luther's funes." In addition to this he also wrote a popular theological defence in the vernacular " On the Holy ^{1 &}quot; Werke, ' Erl, ed., 31, p. 378 ff. 2 Ibid. p. 379. P. 383.

Google

Mass and Priestly ordination" (Leipzig, 1534). In this writing he begins by emphasising the claims of ecclesiastical tradition and the teaching office of the Church: "The Church understands Scripture far better and more surely. thanks to the Holy Spirit promised by Christ and duly sent her, than Luther does by his evil spirit." He laid down the principle which he urged was the only true and reliable guide in the controversies of the age; Hold fast to the teaching of the Church rather than to the subjective interpretations of the Bible, which are often so divergent. He was not, however, altogether happy in his choice of expressions, for instance, when he exclaims: "Bible hither, Bible thither?" for this might well have given the impression, that, on his side, small account was made of the Bible. In reality this was merely his way of retorting on Luther's: "Tradition hither, Tradition thither," The theologian, who elsewhere is careful to set its true value on the Bible, seeks in this way to brand the tricks played with the Bible; armiar phrases then in use were the one we already know, "Bible, Babble, Bubble," and Luther's own sareastic saying: "The Bible is a heresy-book."

Cochleus not only brought forward, in support of the Mass, besides Holy Scripture, that tradition which Luther had treated so scornfully, but also replied to his opponent's perversions and charges on all the other counts. Of the grievous disorders which Luther said had come under his notice during his stay in Rome, what Cochlaus says is much to the point: "It is quite possible, that, among so many thousands from all lands, there may have been some such desperate villains. But it is not seemly that Luther on that score should seek to calumniate pious and devout monks and priests and make the people distrustful of them."

In his familiar conversations Luther repeatedly reveals the psychological side of his attack on the Mass.

He said in 1640: "From the earliest years [of the result against the Church] I was grievously termited by the thought: 'If the Mass is really the highest form of Divine worship, then, Good God, how wickedly have I behaved towards God!" He

On "Bible, Babble, Bubble," see above, vol. ii, pp. 565, 370, on the "Herosy book," see above, p. 396.

LITHER THE RIPORDER manufact to make the following after the following and the following the to any the state of the second La ay, By an of the state some about the source of the state of the st Manager of the Artistance of t Show have to bridge to make a street when

From the Man and A great and the state of th

Array the Mark the Ma to the second board was a few of the second An and second first and second to the same had been some some County 16 house forms 2 three for the Board and the State of the State East while tracks to make the special prosphere would be true with the state of the Hot water my arrival tax . April 100 to the first tax . The fi

the Mann, IATO, was fulfilled sort, I for stand that then y had absent some first the arrange fresh these in idelinary officers to declinary in tree of said allows a first said topics and to provide to deliver he new if and along them and the same firms and the same the major reputation of his wind at attended that the formation of the state of the the math are leadership things and for any state of the math are leadership things and the math are leadership things are leadership things and the math are leadership to the math are leadership t The second of the Manual County of the Manual Count FAO bod, The about the said of the Mann, was the any face only facely believe the and the matter than the matt through you the tireld on arriving and have being and you are the first tireld to a first that are the first tireld to a first that are the first tireld to a first tireld tireld to a first tireld to a first tireld tireld to a first tireld tireld tireld tireld tireld tireld tireld tireld tireld tirel then to the next of anything and the set of any then the set of any then the set of any then the set of the se

For the state of the self fighted successful to the speed of the speed of the state. College of the part of the par Let, and the series and the hint case the series of corners at the first should be set it in a fact that for the first should be set it in a fact that for the first should be set it in a fact that the set it is a fact that the set is a fact that the se and of the fact of a first state for the factor of the factor decreases and a feet of a first state of the factor of the factor the set of the second of a few time y conserver. It so on the according to the second of th the field before you are the fact and school and order and the frequency and the field beautique as And the same of th

Services appropriate to the services of the se to the Introduction to the # Arp n 1

the the better written before her first bloom " Brestweldigt, "" on a large state of the second state of the se Alexandra and the state of the knowledge of the actual facts is as great here as it is when, in his Table-Talk, he makes private Masses originate in the time of

Pope Gregory I († 604).1

Incidentally he describes quite frankly one way in which he had endeavoured to overthrow the Mass: At first it had seemed to him impossible to achieve its fall because its roots were so deeply ambedded in the human heart. "But when once the Sacrament is received under both kinds, the Mass will not stand much longer "1-We have already had occasion to describe the underhand measures he recommended in the warfare against the Mass (Vol. ii., p. 321 f.).

In part at least, he could congratulate himself on the success of his unboly efforts. "If our Lord God shows me to die a natural death, He will be playing a nasty trick on the Papate, because they will have failed to burn the man who has thus brought the Mass to nought,""

Denunciation of the Mass naturally occupies a place in Luther's Articles of Schmalkalden. Since the latter were incorporated in the "Symbolic Books" of the Lutheran Evangelical Church and figure in the Book of Concord with the three oldest Œcumenical Creeds, the Confession of Augsburg, etc., as writings "recognised and accepted as godly truths by our blessed forefathers and by us," condemnation of the Mass became as much a traditional canonwithin the Protestant fold as Luther himself could have desired.

In the Schmalkalden Articles we find, after the first article on Justification by Faith alone, a second article on the office and work of Jesus Christ which declares: "That the Mass among the Papists must be the greatest and most frightful abomination " because it is " in direct and violent opposition" to the first article, according to which the Lamb of God alone delivers man from sin, not " a wicked or pious minister of the Mass by his work." The Mass is a " work of men, yea, of wicked knaves," a source " of unspeakable abuses by the buying and selling of Masses,11 defended by the Papists only because they "know very wel, that if the Mass falls, the Papacy too must perish." Over and above all this, that dragon's tail, which is the Mass, has produced much filth and vermin and many forms of idolatry : First of all Purgatory; for the excerable market of Masses Ibid. On Gregory the Great, see above, p. 517 a. S.

 Ibid., p. 119.
 Ibid., p. 122.
 Symbol. Bücher¹⁰, p. 301 ff.
 Luthers Worke," Erl. ed., 25°. p. 174 ff.

for the dead produced that " devilish spectre " of Purgatory. Secondly, "on account of it evil spirits have performed much trickery by appearing as the souls of men"; the devils " with unspeakable reguery " demanded Masses, etc. "Thirdly, pilgrimages, whereby people ran after Masses, forgiveness of sins, and the Grace of God, for the Mass ruled everything " and caused men to run after " hurtful, devilish will-o'-the-wisps." "Fourthly, the brotherhoods" with their Masses, etc., are also " contrary to the first article of the Atonement." "Fifthly, the holy things" (relies) were also "supposed to effect forgiveness of sin as being a good work and worship of God like the Mass " "Sixthly, here belong also the beloved Indulgence" in which "Judas incarnate, i.e. the Pope, sells the merits of Christ."—Hence even Indulgences are made out to be one of the unhappy consequences of the Mass!

It is a ruled, after such ismentable utterances which could only have been accepted by people whom prejudice in Luther's favour had rendered band, to recall the clear statements—so full of convict on —on the Real Presence of Christ in the Sacrament, which occur in the very writings in which Luther attacks the Mass. Our second volume concluded with a cheering confession on the part of the Wittenberg Professor of his faith in the Trimity and Incarnation, a confession which both did him honour and expressed those consoling and incontrovertible truths which constitute the common treasure of the Christian creeds. The present volume also, after the sad pictures of dissent of which it is only too full, may charitably end with the words in which Luther voices his belief in the Sacrament of the Altar, the lasting memorial of Divine Love, in which our Lord never ceases to pray for unity amongst those bidden as guests to His table.

"I hereby confess before God and the whole world that I believe and do not doubt, and with the help and grace of my dear Lord Jesus Christ will maintain even to that Day, that where Mass is celebrated according to Christ's ordinance whether amongst us Lutherans or in the Papacy, or in Greece or in India (even though under one kind only—though that is wrong and an abuse), there is present under the species of the Bread, the true Body of Christ given for us on the cross, and, under the species of wine, the true Blood of Christ shed for us; nor is it a spiritual or fictitious Body and Blood, but the true natura. Body and Blood taken of the holy, virginal, and really human body of Mary, without the intervention of any man but conceived of the Holy Ghost alone; which Body and Blood of Christ now sitteth at the right hand of the Majesty of God in the Divine Person, which is Christ Jesus, true, real, and eternal God, with the Father of Whom He is begotten from all eternity, etc. And that same Body and Blood of the Son of God, Jesus Christ, not only the Saints and those who are worthy, but also sinners and the unworthy truly handle and receive, bodily though invisibly, with hands, mouth, chalice, paten, corporal, or whatever else be used when it is given and received in the Mass."

"This is my faith, this I know, and no one shall take it from me"

He had always, so he insists, by his testimony upheld the "clear, plain text of the Gospel" against heresies old and new, and withstood the "devil's malice and work in the service and for the betterment of my dear brothers and sisters, in accordance with Christian charity."

¹ "Brieff von seinem Buch der Winckelmessen," "Werke," Erl. ed., 31, p. 381 f.

END OF VOL. IV

Gougle

PRINTED BY WILLIAM BEENDON AND SON, LTD. PLYNOSTH

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY BERKELEY

Return to deak from which borrowed.

This book is DUE on the last date stamped below.

	IN STACKE
22Sep 335	S OCT 6 1960
19 Aug '558 & 1955 LU Stan'57NVX	DCT 29 1960
4 Apr'59DF	1N STACKS DCT 1 1993 REC'D LD NOV 1 0'63 -5 PM
6500 TO
LD 21=100m-7,53(A2528)	l l

